towards the relief of the SUFFERERS at MONTREAL in CANADA.

THE several acts of private munificence to French prisoners during the late war, how soon soever they may be forgotten by that nation, will mark out the generosity and humanity of Britons, to the remotest posterity. If we fall short of the French in external civility, it is confessed, that sincerity and humanity constitute our characteristic. This is discoverable even in the most uncivilized part of our fellow-subjects: their compassion increases with their power of revenge; and as it is the great property of freedom to teach men a quick sense of human misery, we generally find that acts of benevolence to enemies keep
