

Small crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.,

Lays o' Hame and Country. By Alexander
LOGAN.

'To any one who has carefully read these poems, there can be little or no doubt that their author has a true poetic genius, coming nearer to Burns in many respects than any of his fellow-countrymen. So great is the likeness, especially in the power of expressing himself in the vernacular, that it is sometimes hard to be persuaded our author is not Burns himself. Yet we fail to detect any servile imitation. All is perfectly natural. Whatever he does is marked by care and elegance, with grace and beauty, yet without such tender pathos, such charming simplicity, as to compel any but the prejudiced to confess that he is a true poet.'—Literary World.

'Marked by three excellent qualities. They are natural, unaffected, sincere; they are short, and there is in them all a high moral tone. Many of them are pretty, and one or two have the ring of the genuine lyric.'—Dundee Advertiser.

'His verse flows tunelessly, embodying fine sentiments in language that is as appropriate as it is melodious. He evidently writes from the heart, and what the heart prompts his hand and pen can readily and fluently indite.'—Dumfries and Galloway Standard and Advertiser.

'Seldom has such a good collection of homely pieces been issued by a native bard, and to all lovers of the Scotch "doric" in rhyme we heartily recommend Mr. Logan's book.'—Hawick Express.

'There is considerable variety here presented to us, both of matters and form—songs of the affections, in which wife and weans figure as "the true pathos and sublime of human life;" love songs, humorous songs, moral and patriotic songs. Mr. Logan, like every poet worthy of the name, is comprehensive in his sympathies, loving mankind "the world o'er," but beginning, of course, at his own Jerusalem. He is an Edinburgh man born and bred, and brimful of love for his native land, which he has here vigorously, yet finely, expressed. He has evidently a passion for natural scenery, especially for Scotland's hills and glens, for beauty in every shape, and especially for the beautiful in human characters and conduct. The moral tone of the book is thoroughly healthy; the style is brisk and racy, or tender and soft-flowing as the subject may require; the literary workmanship, considering that the author is a working man, is uniformly and amazingly good, the right word seeming always to fall into the right place; and every piece showing a well-cultivated taste.'—Edinburgh Courier.

'Logan has been styled the "Laureate of the Household," and certainly he has no slender claims to the distinction. His "Lays o' Hame," which bulk so largely in the book, are all of them good, and many of them exceedingly beautiful, varied, touching, and pathetic. Purity and tenderness of feeling, natural and unaffected simplicity, truth of description, and warmth and heartiness of love and sympathy, are their leading characteristics. Add to these a chaste and musical diction, "guid braid Scotch," handled with graceful ease, and a complete mastery of the more mechanical parts of the verse-maker's art, and we have a sum-total for this workman's "recreations" of which any author might be proud.'—Perthshire Constitutional.

'The author—a working man—admirably fills his niche among the minor poets of Scotland, and we are disposed to agree with a leading critic when he says, "They are bright sparks of Prometheus fire" lit off the dusty anvil of a patient but toilsome life.'—Cutlock.