The Hotel Keeper's Christmas Dream

A certain hotelkeeper whose name is "Legion" was retiring at the close of Christmas Day. His soul was at ease. He had had a good day. Thanks to a law which was forced upon him, and against which he had protested in vain—thanks to this law he had had a holiday. He had spent the day with his family, and it was a good day. His children had lived over again the sweet mystery of Santa Claus. Down the chimney he had come, without a doubt, and, wonderful to say, had loaded their stockings with just the things they wanted. Wee Jessie and sturdy Jack and womanly Mary had all been generously dealt with by "Old Sandy," and Jessie and Jack and Mary had not forgotten their father and mother.

They had had a fine dinner, for the cook had instructions to spare no expense or pains to make the dinner all Chrstmas Day should be. It was a good day, and Legion rested in his own soft upholstered chair and watched his children play as the warm radiators about him diffused gentle comfort throughout the room.

He was thinking, "Well, I have had a good year. I have a fine property here. I have spent a lot of money on improvements. My dining-room is a model of good taste, cleanliness and beauty. My bar-room is one of the finest in the country and its fixtures are chaste and costly. My bartender is a total abstainer and absolutely trustworthy. My house is well furnished and finished from garret to cellar. My customers are always sure of careful and courteous attention. All this has cost me much, but it is all paid for. I owe no man a dollar, and when I started fifteen years ago I had very little. Yes, I have done well. I have had a good year."

The evening had gone and he was retiring. He peeped in at sweet, wee Jessie, tucked in her crib, sleeping soundly, with her rosy cheeks framed in golden curls and her new dolly hugged tight in a plump little arm, and a noble, tender father's love stirred his soul. She was worth more to him than all his property and business-yea, more than all the world. How he loved his sweet little sleeping angel of beauty and light.

And then to his own bed, where in the silence of the night discomforting thoughts came to him. He remembered that his womanly Mary had planned to give the boys and girls of her class a New Year's party, and was compelled to forego the idea because so many had come to her and said they would not be allowed to attend. His heart raged at the thought. A good, respectable, lawabiding hotel like his, and no purer, sweeter girl in the land than his girl. But his fatherly anger had in it a fatherly heart-ache. It was not all anger. And sweet Jessie's birthday party had been a failure. Only three little tots turned up, and Jessie's father and mother knew why. And he knew quite well that no boys from good homes ever came to Jack's home to play with him.

He fell into a troubled sleep. He dreamed that Tom Worthless was at his bedside. Tom had had a fine flour and feed business fifteen years ago when Legion came to town and a wife and children. Tom had spent hundreds and hundreds of dollars over his bar, and about five years ago had failed through drink, and since then had become a hopeless toper. His children had gone to work before the legal age, and the truant officer had said, "What can I do? If they do not work they will starve." And now he dreamed that Tom was standing at his bedside and saying, "Legion, you did it. I love my babes just as much as you love yours. But you took my money and gave me worse than nothing in return. You robbed me of self-respect, honor, health. You robbed me of my soul. I tried and prayed and fought to quit, but your bar-room was ever open. I could not pass the door. Then I had money, then you sought my patronage. Now that you have taken all that I have you do not want me about. You order me away; I am a disgrace to your fine house. To-day your children had a Christmas dinner with money which I put over your bar last week. My children are crying now with cold and hunger. No Santa Claus came to our house. I have been lying all day drunk at home. This year I earned only about $200. You got every cent. Yes, you have had a good year.

And when Tom Worthless was gone Old Bill Soak took his place, and with a hellish anger glittering in his eye he said, "Legion, you did it. I was a moulder. No better moulder trod the streets of this city. Fifteen years ago, when you set up in business here, I was earning $4 a day. My wife was delicate and I cared for her tenderly, for I loved her tenderly. I drank a little then. Your bar-room, with its bright lights and welcome warmth and sober barkeeper lured me. It was there I began to forget and neglect the love of my youth. Friends, minister, my foreman and my employer did all they could for me, but to no purpose. When my wife died I was lying drunk in the street-drunk with whiskey which I got in your bar-room. My sons have disowned me, and I am just Old Bill Soak, down and out. God help me! You did it all, and what you have done to me you have done to many others. Hundreds of dollars each year you took from me. My wife and home-you took that, too. Give it back! Give it back! Give it back, or God's curse will fall on you and yours! Give it back, I say!"

Then he dreamed that he saw Mary-his womanly Mary-a bride. And in swift panorama he saw her a drunkard's wife, and he saw his child's husband in a bar-room just like his own, mingling Mary's dear name with coarse laughter and vile jests. He saw a bartender, just like his own, a total abstainer, giving him drink and more drink, and Mary's life broken and her face swollen with blows and tears, and he cried, "Stop! In the name of God, stop that cursed business! I will, I must, protect my child!"

And Jack, who inherited the money made from selling whiskey-Jack, sturdy, manly Jack-he dreamed that Jack was a wandering, penniless prodigal, singing in barrooms for beer, mingling the heavenly music of his welltrained voice with the thick smoke of intoxication and the fire lent him from heaven with obscenity and lust. And Jack came to his bedside and said, "Father, you did it. You tried to keep me from drink. What else could you expect to happen than what has happened from our surroundings as children? I am a vile, degraded wretch, and sweet Jessie-sweet, wee Jessie- Oh, God! can I tell you! She has gone the way where her life is hell and will soon puff itself out. Father, no good, no happiness, no peace, ever came from money made in a barroom. Hell is on the track of the bar-room gains; it is

With a moan of woe he awoke and heard sweet Jessie calling "Daddy!" and groaned alour, "GOD GRANT THAT EVERY BAR-ROOM IN THIS CITY BE CLOSED NEXT MONDAY!"

THE ELECTORS of Ward 4, Brantford

I have been persistently urged by ratepayers familiar with my past civic record to offer myself for election as Alderman in Ward 4, but not until I read in Tuesday night's city papers of the overdraft of this year, a modest little sum. of over $17,000.00, also of the very considerable debt on hospital account of $5,500.00 odd, and perhaps the necessary requirements for Waterworks improvements, did I consent to become a candidate.
