IRISH CURRENCY

The last news from Ireland is to the effect that the Sinn Feiner, whose exchequer was reported depleted last week are now issuing due bills in Limerick. The operation is a simple one with a printing press but the trouble is to get the stuff in circulation. The Fenians in the U. S. tried it and failed in 1864-5, although their notes had the fiat of the Irish Republic stamped upon them. In 1888, King James the second tried to pay his Irish troops with brass money, but the issue was a failure, and the principal losers were those enthusiasts to the Stuart cause, who contributed all their old brass pots, pans, and candle-sticks.

An historian of those times wrote that at the battle of the Boyne, William's Dutch troops were surprised by receiving a shower of brass half-pence from an Irish Battery which caused a hearty laugh amongst the stolid Hollanders. It may be well feared that the resorting to such a currency by the present generation will have similar results.
