The whole position points again to Newfoundlanders had only been brokshe will succeed in this fortunately limited purpose. She has three fronts to consider. In the West she is convinced that the Flanders ridges can be held and the retirement post-poned through the winter. The weather is an invaluable and increasing ally to her there, and she knows it. Whether she is right or not no-one can say: all we know is that the French and British are creeping forward through the mud bit by bit, day after day, and that some day they must bound forward, advancing by the mile where they now advance by the mile where they now advance by the yard. Germany has managed the Russians very well. She is firmly established at Riga and in the Riga Gulf. She is immune from attack for a long time, and that is all she wants. She can afford to withdraw troops by the thousand and she does so. The the thousand and she does so. The full force of these unfavourable conditions falls upon the Italians. which seems to us undeniable, sug-gests an answer which is very reassering. It must be known to the Allies' leaders, who have doubtless weighed it well; and the fact that they have not acted upon it may be proof of their confidence in the situation, of their confidence in Italy and in Russia. If all hold firm it will not matter what Germany and Austria believe or do not believe. The Amerians can then be held in til the spring, when they can enter the arena fresh against exhausted adversaries with a simultaneous physical and moral effect that will be utterly shattering. If this be the true state of things, it is most encouraging. Big Deeds by 'Little" Newfoundland.

If they succeed they will do far more than remove the great menace that has confronted Austria. With November will end, for the purpose of large and decisive operations, the campaign of 1917. But much can happen in those four or five weeks; he must be blind indeed who cannot see that very great things are happening even now. The movements, the large strategy, of the enemy during the last.

Newfoundland had before the war no soldiers, no militia, and no militiaty system. Most of the people had never seen a soldier. Gladstone took the last imperial garrison away in 1868. Immediately war broke out the Newfoundlanders resolved to take their share. They sent 1,000 seamen for the Navy and 500 volunteers as the start of a Newfoundland Regiment. The original thousand mark has been greatly exceeded; the seamen have shared the glory of the Navy by taking their part in most of the great sea actions of the war.

How could they support the trials of another winter with the prospect before them at the end of it of so great an addition to the number of their enemies? The orly way of getting the fact so known is to put the Americans into action. There
