THE WORLD WANTS OIL!

To the uninitiated, the recent advance in crude oil may not mean much, but to interested parties it carries a world of meaning. Oil to-day is king of fuels. It has largely supplanted coal, and without it industry would be paralyzed. During the war every available pool was tapped and drained, causing a big surplus when the war finished. Production was then drastically curtailed, forcing low prices on many issues, but many reputable parties who saw a reversal of form when the over supply should have been exhausted, warned us of a time to come when oil should be again supreme. The tide has turned, and to-day the word is "BUY THE GOOD OILS."

Japan's New Premier Once a Slave in U.S.A.

Japan's new Premier, Korekio Takahashi, was once a slave in the United States. Premier Takahashi was born in San Francisco twenty years ago, and was sold into slavery in the mines by a labor agent. Prince Quakura, a Japanese envoy on his way to London, heard of the Japanese slave and purchased his freedom, giving him money to go to school. The future Premier made quick advancement, and after acquiring a thorough knowledge of English and some acquaintance with American business methods returned to Japan.

"It is not often that I go down past Prescott Street when coming home, but I did to-day, and in STEELE'S Crockery window I saw Fancy Teapots for 75 cents that are well worth $1.25—dec. 21

Lord Robert Cecil

POLITICS OF THE EMPIRE.

One of the most interesting, and perhaps one of the most powerful, delegates to the Conference on the Limitation of Armament at Washington was Lord Robert Cecil, who represented South Africa. Lord Robert Cecil has been called the very soul of the League of Nations. Where he stands on the disarmament question is not in doubt. He would like to see every sword in the world beaten into a ploughshare or a pruning hook tomorrow. If that could be done safely, Lord Robert Cecil wants nothing for himself, nor does he want anything unfair for Britain. The anonymous writer of "The Mirrors of Downing Street" says that at the Paris Peace Conference Lord Robert kept the ideal of the League of Nations alive in an atmosphere that was charged with war, and prevented those conferences from being a "peace to end peace."

This writer has a great admiration for Lord Robert, and says that the great defect in his character, the only thing that keeps him from being the greatest political force in England to-day, is the lack of that quality with which he is most generally charged. Lord Robert is suspected of being a fanatic. He has every quality for the first rank and for the foremost passion or enthusiasm. It is a sense of humor, an engaging diffidence, a continual deviation toward a mild and gentle cynicism—the very antithesis of a fanatical temper—that keeps him from leadership. We are told that there is no more firmly fixed idea in the minds of the British people than that the conquering qualities of a great captain are courage and confidence. Lord Robert has given no sign of these qualities. "He appears upon the platform as a gentleman makes his entrance into a drawing room, not as a toreador leaps into the bull ring."

He expresses his opinions as a gentleman expresses opinions at a dinner table, and not as the able-house politician aims his dogmatism in the tabernacle. Naturally he could hardly compete for public favor with such a man as Lloyd George, who would employ vulgar methods from which Cecil would shrink.

Early in the war Lord Robert perceived clearly that what the nation wanted above all else was not a great political leader, but a great moral leader. He said once that under the public show of national life the British people were famishing for guidance. He numbered himself among those anxiously scanning the horizon for such a leader. In the view of the Gentleman With a Duster, he should have instead been answering the inarticulate cry of the people for that leader. He had in himself the qualities needed, but here again diffidence prevented him from stepping forth and filling a role that no one in England was so well fitted to all. Says the writer: "No good man of my acquaintance is more powerfully convinced of the goodness of British nature. He watches the British people with an abiding affection. He believes that they possess, even those of them who appear most degraded and sordid, the foundational virtues of Christian character—a love of justice, an instinct for kindness and a faith in truth."

More than one of his fine addresses has taken for its text the words of Edith Cavell—Patriotism is not enough. Her murder by the Germans moved him perhaps more than any single incident of the war. Pondering over it, he said that what most impressed him was, not that the Germans thought it no crime to shoot a woman, but that they should be wholly incapable of understanding why such an atrocious deed should shock the world. He realized in the war that the Allies were not fighting an enemy who could be shouted down, but one whose spirit and temper were quite different from those of the British people, and that this spirit must be understood before it could be conquered. As Minister of Blockade he performed services of greatest value. He kept Sweden neutral when the Russian Foreign Office was breathless with anxiety on this point. He showed in this department that he is no mere idealist, but a man with a strong, practical grasp of affairs, whose head may be in the clouds, but whose feet are on solid earth.

Making Up the Loss.

Whilst an errand boy was conveying a truckload of soda water syphons through the street, the wheel suddenly came off, with the result that every bottle was smashed.

The lad showed signs of much distress, and a crowd speedily congregated to ascertain the nature of the disaster.

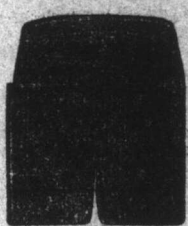

After seeing what had happened, a benevolent old gentleman expressed his sympathy, and gave the lad a shilling, an example which was followed by other bystanders.

Enough money was eventually subscribed to replace the damaged goods. The boy proceeded to repair his barrow as best he could, and the spectators dispersed with the exception of one, more curious than the rest, who inquired if the lad knew who his kind benefactor was who started the collection.

"Know him? Rather! He's a cute 'un, he is. That's my boss!"
