Princess Mary's New Home.

There are few, if any, manors in England which have a more romantic and distinguished history than that of Harewood, the future home of Princess Mary, who will, however, it is understood, spend the early years of her married life at Goldborough Hall, Knareborough.

Ever since the Conqueror gave the rich Harewood lands, with the neighboring fee of Skipton-in-Craven, to Robert de Romell, one of his soldiers, the manor has had a sequence of lords as illustrious, and of ladies as fair and high-born as any in England, writes Thornton Hall, author of "The Redmans of Harewood and Levens." Robert's only daughter found a husband in William de Meschines, the Conqueror's great-grand-nephew, thus forging the first of many links between Harewood and the Throne.

Cecily's daughter, Alice, found a husband in another royal lord, William Fitz-Duncan, Earl of Murray, and nephew of Malcolm, King of Scotland. And it was the son of this union, the "Boy of Eglismont," who was so tragically drowned in the waters of the Strid, in Bolton Woods, and whose untimely end found such a sympathetic describer in Wordsworth. As cousin to Malcolm, King of Scotland, and to Henry VI of England, this youthful Lord of Harewood was within sight of a throne.

Thus the Harewood lords and ladies follow each other down the centuries de Courcy's and Fitzgeraldis; an Earl of Devon and an Earl of Albemarle—until we come to Aveline de Fortibus, who succeeded to both earldoms, and combined the sovereignty of the Isle of Wight with the lordship of Harewood.

An heiress so richly dowered was a prize well worth the winning of a King's son; and thus it came to pass that Aveline was mated with Edmund Plantagenet, afterwards Duke of Lancaster, Henry III's son, "the King and Queen (we read) and almost all the nobility being present at the wedding." Thus for the fourth time within two centuries Harewood had a lord of royal blood.

In the generations that followed we find among the lords of Harewood John, Lord de Lisle, one of the first batch of Knights of the Garter; Sir Richard Redman, Speaker of the House of Commons, who had for wife a daughter of the first Lord Aldeburgh; and the great and ill-fated Earl of Strafford, who preferred a "poorhouse" outside his park to the splendours of his ancestral castle. Harewood Castle, which had seen six centuries of splendid life, had become a dismantled ruin when, in 1738, the manor passed by purchase to the hands of Henry Lascelles, ancestor of the present earl; and it was not until twenty years later that the walls of Harewood House, one of the most magnificent of England's "lordly pleasure houses," began to rise.

Although no link of descent connects the Lascelles with the long line of earlier lords, they have a worthy continued Harewood's splendid traditions for nearly two centuries. They have added to the long and distinguished list of Harewood's ladies two daughters of marquises (Bath and Clanricarde), and the daughter of the third Earl of Bradford; and they have displayed a regal hospitality from the days, a century and more ago, when the Grand Duke Nicholas was their guest, to the recent visit of Queen Mary and Princess Mary, who will be Harewood's first Royal lady.

Lord Lascelles is not only the inheritor of priceless treasure in Chesterfield House, and the prospective owner of others at Harewood, but he is a collector of note into the bargain. Old English furniture, china, and silver prove irresistible lodestones to him; and here is formed one big link between the Queen and her future son-in-law, for Her Majesty's knowledge of, and passion for, such things is well known. Princess Mary, too, imbued much of the same taste from her mother, with whom she has paid visits to various museums and collections, so that here, as in the hunting field and other spheres of life, the Princess finds much in common with her future husband.

The Laugh on the Company.

Something along the line of the famous advertisement written by Mark Twain for the Hartford Accident Insurance Co., is the following from an American exchange:
The insurance companies are now making accidents a pleasure. Mr. Smith, the broker, comes down and shows you a policy which is so attractive that you can hardly keep from going right out on the street and getting run over.
If you get killed you lose your life.

Man Without a Pulse.

I don't know why he is alive, says Doctor.

A man with, it would seem, a unique complication of maladies is James Rostron, aged fifty-nine, of Manchester. "Chronic bronchitis, chronic asthma, sclerosis of the liver, badly diseased kidneys, and frightfully distended heart" were the terms of a diagnosis by several doctors of Rostron, who claimed damages at Manchester County Court in respect of an accident which occurred while at his work. "I don't know why he is alive," said Dr. Johnson, in giving evidence. "He has no pulse."
Another medical man stated that Rostron's extended to his ribs and reached down to his abdomen.
Rostron, in spite of his afflictions, gave evidence vigorously, describing how he strained himself in the endeavour to lift a beam. He was awarded £15.

Navigation in Fog.

Syren and Shipping says that tests have recently been carried out in Kiel Bay of an acoustic-electrical system for determining the exact whereabouts of a ship, enabling her to enter a port and to navigate difficult coast waters in a fog. The system has been developed by a Berlin shipping firm in conjunction with Siemens and Halske. The location of a ship in a fog is effected in the following manner: The ship wishing to determine her whereabouts sends ashore a wireless message to that effect, and she is then requested to make a signal. This is sent from the ship and is taken up by a number of special microphones installed along the coast and connected with the oscillographs furnished by Siemens and Halske. On this apparatus a narrow film strip appears on which are marked the differences in the time occupied by the transmission of the signal from the ship to each of the different microphones. It is from these differences in time, which can be read with the utmost exactness to the hundredth of a second, that the ship's location is determined. This is then at once read off from a chart upon which the lines of a similar time difference in the sound signal are indicated, and the reading is transmitted to the ship by wireless. The whole procedure occupies about five minutes. It is stated that the experiments at Kiel were thoroughly successful.

Women Smoking Less.

An informal census of the habits of the Oxford undergraduates, reveals the interesting fact that, roughly speaking, only one in five smokes and that in the 20 per cent. of smokers very few make a habit of the cigarette. They smoke one or two now and then as a social accomplishment rather than a pleasant amusement. Those who invites her friends and acquaintances to nine o'clock cocoa is not expected to provide either "gaspers" or "Egyptians." It is no slur on hospitality not to offer a smoke. Without doubt smoking is on the decline in Oxford. One reason may be that the modern girl goes to Oxford to prepare for a profession and is not for the most part, but with full allowance for such local influences the census strengthens the general opinion that women smoke less and that the fashion is gradually wanting in England as in many other countries.
The growing belief that smoking is bad for the complexion may be helping to rout the fashion.

THAT PULL AWAY SPIRIT.

Personally, I feel too strongly the advantages to the greatest number of temperance people to have my adversity devil aroused by prohibition, but I know you will be disgusted with me when I tell you what did arouse it.
Silly, But It's True.
The "no accident weeks." When I saw all the signs displayed urging us to think always of safety first, and by all means if we had to have an accident to avoid having one this week, I felt a most ungodly desire to have an accident happen to me on the spot.
It may be that in my case this was partly due to the fact that from my earliest youth I have had an overdose of the safety-first spirit. Which leads me back to my first paragraph, and the assertion that it is not only reformers but also parents who fail to make enough allowance for the innate perversity of the human mind. Over and over again have children develop qualities as sheer reaction against excess of the opposite qualities. In those about them. I feel sure that my own recklessness as a child was largely my reaction against too much safety first.

WHAT DOES THE CHILD DO!
If you take a child by the arm and start to pull it away from something what does it do? It pulls back against you, of course. And that's just what children (small and large, both) are apt to do when yanked away from anything too strenuously.
Of course there are times when you have to yank. The child that is about to set himself has to be yanked away from the fireplace. But there are other times when you can avoid arousing the pull away spirit, and will thereby facilitate getting what you want—the best good of the child.

Ninety Per Cent. Perversity.
Everyone knows of people who never cared anything about drinking before who are now going about swapping recipes for home brew or boasting of their ability "to get the stuff" through special channels. The fact that they were forbidden to drink aroused their perversity and they want to now as they never have wanted to before.
The Authorman contends that the greatest mistake the temperance people ever made was to push through prohibition and arouse this devil of perversity, when they should have the proposition sold on the basis of efficiency. He thinks that if they had gone on advertising the folly of handicapping oneself by drinking, instead of trying to force the issue, they would have accomplished far more.

Future Fisheries.

There Are Still Plenty of Good Fish in the Sea, So Why Worry!

The war gave the North Sea a chance to become repopulated with fish, and, in consequence, catches have been good since 1919.
But seeing that in the course of a year the trawlers working in the North Sea sweep every acre of the available trawling grounds at least once, it cannot be long before the fishing again falls off. The fishing vessels will then be driven farther afield.
Already trawlers work large banks near the Faroe Islands and the South of Iceland. They also trawl in the White Sea, and on Banks off the coast of Spain.
The Governments of various countries have been busy charting new fishing grounds, and several of great value have already been discovered.
Off the Algerian coast, for instance, are shallows extending to 5,600 square miles. This part of the Mediterranean is rich in fish, but these resources have hardly been touched so far. There are banks off the mouth of the Congo populated by huge swarms of mullet. The Portuguese are the only fishermen who have fished in this water.

Off the North of Iceland are almost virgin trawling grounds, and among the richest banks in the world are those lying in the Pacific, off British Columbia.
South America has magnificent fishing grounds in the Bay of Monte Video, where the Government of Uruguay is organising trawlers. There are fine fisheries off the barren Kerguelen Island, while banks which positively swarm with dozens of varieties of fine food fish surround those strange islands, the Galapagos, the home of the giant tortoise, and the scene of countless legends of buried treasure.

Nearer home there are banks off the Western Irish coast which are little used, yet which yield as good fish as the North Sea itself.

RECEPTIVE FIGURES.
An American citizen invested in 100 shares of German securities bought in Germany. He paid 300,000 marks and held them until the market looked favorable and sold for 500,000 marks. His profit was 200,000 marks and looked as though he had a large income tax to pay to this government.
He was permitted to figure the transaction in dollars with a contrary result. The 300,000 marks invested in the securities were worth $3,000. When he sold for 500,000 marks, that sum was worth only $5,000. The result was that a gain of 200,000 marks represented an actual loss of $4,000 which he was allowed to deduct in his tax return.
