Adam Graeme, of Mossgray

But sauntering along the Calton Hill now, along to dream over the old town in its antique grace and beauty, made me sick at learn the way and the state of the served grace when they should be served grace when the served grace when they should be served grace when of our own land. Their shadow is upon her in all places; the very neighbors, common-place they are, speak low, I fancy, when they speak of "Lillie," and I forgive them the smiliarity for the sake of the gracious name, for the stately flower in its royal purity symbolizes my ideal well, and my garden at Mossgray grows white with snowy lilies, and I wander among them dreamily, in a mist of indefinite hopes, and fancied pladnesses, too bright to tell.

The beautiful time! when every foundation stood fast, and all that was, was true and constant, and of kin to the pure heavens.

tion stood fast, and all that was, was true and constant, and of kin to the pure heavens.

Yet Lilias was only the daughter of Mr. Johnstone of Greenshaw, who had little henore or standing beyond the bounds of Fendie. Murrayshaugh would have growled the utmost thunder of his anathema upon flucy, had he known that in her sisterly kindness she had accompanied me to the confortable plebelian parlor where shone my star, and electrified good Mr. Johnstone into hopes of future friendships with those adjacent landed families, who had not hitherto condescended to notice him. But Lilias was shy of Lucy, and seemed, to my chagrin, indifferent to her visit; so I had to console myself with a transitory belief that Lilias felt proudly the injustice of those artificial barriers of society, and was sensible of wrong done to her native dignity by the faise rule which made the laird's daughter of Murrayshaugh a greater person than she, and by Lucy's quiet smile and gentle word of consolation. "By and by. Adam—we will be better friends, by and by."

Yes—there was no landed family of them all which could beast a line so long and so unbroken as that of Mossaray. The incumbrances on the estate had gradually melted away during my frugal minority. I was able to maintain appropriately the position I had inherited. Only this one external matter of rank did Lilias want, and I had it, to lay it at her feet—the neme itself acquired new honor and dignity, when my heart beat to anticipate the advent of a new lady of Moss-gray, who should eclipse all who went be-fore.

I greatly affected Mr. Johnstone's con I greatly affected Mr. Johnstone's company then. He was a shrewd man, if not a refined one; and albet he did not possess that fearful command of words which strikes one with utter panic when one comes to the beginning of a speech of his follow crattsman the "Wanderer" of Wordsworth, he yet could manage to keep up a conversation toisrably well, by help of an occasional monosyllable from the other interlocutor—we became greater friends. He gave me counsel about the management of my lands; he told me that Matthew Irving of Friarsford, whose tack was nearly out, had been holding his farm for some years past nearly rout free, so greatly had the land increased in value, since his father got the lease. He taken to me of foreign wars and home politics—I listened in happy unconsciousness teeling only that I was conciliating the good will of the father of Lilias, and advancing slowly to traverse to shreaved a man not politics—I listened in happy unconsciousness feeling only that I was concilating the goodwill of the father of Lilias, and advancing slowly to my aim.

Mr. Johnstone was too shrewd a man not to perceive by and by what brought me so often, bashful and absorbed, into that corner of his parlor. The good man evidently believed at first that I sought the benefit and enlightenment of his conversation; But through a flood of random answers, and unhappy lack of comprehension on my part, of arguments which I never heard, his eyes were opened. He was by no means displeased, I fancied. I was "Mossgray" already, my income was good, my prospects better. I was altogether eligible for a sontinuaw.

And by and by, I thought I discovered that the Fondie young ladies, who bere Lilias company sometimes, looked at her with wicked secret laughs and whisperings when I entered the room. Could Lilias guess bersell? Alas, I could not toll: I was to self-conscious to be at ease with her, and she had slways been shy to me.

And matters remained in this uncertain state for a considerable time. I became of age. Murrayshaugh gruffly resigned, as he had gruffly undertaken, the guardianship of myself and my possessions. His house grow more and more desolate as I fancied, and Lucy paler and more thoughtful every day. She was quite alone, and we used to walk together sometimes on the old terrace in silent sympathy, thinking of Hew. He had reached his destination safely, and entered with cheerfulness (as he told us) into the duties of his office; but the loss of him cast a shadow over the house of his fathers. Perhaps it might be only that—perhaps there was something more; but a sadder decay seemed to be gathering over it every time I visited Murrayshaugh.

Complaints from the Medical Health Officer.

At a meeting of the Board of Health held yesterday afternoon Ald. J. Heaman (chairman), Hannah, Parnell, Dr. Hutchinson, Dr. Gardiner, C. H. Ivey, Inspector Bell and Secretary Bell were present. Cholora is reported to be coming westward, and the inspector was instructed to have all outhouse cleaned by Aug. 15.

The board decided not to pay an account from the chief of police for $74.25 for services of P. C. Lumby while the house-to-house inspection was in progress.

The engineer and medical health officer recommended that the old houses at 191; 193 and 195 Dundas street be torn down, as they are in an unsanitary condition and health officer explained that such lanes as that one were among the dirtiest portions of the city, and recommended that it be paved and drained and the adjoining property assessed for the cost.

Mr. Ivey explained that the cost could not be charged against the property owners, as the board had not that power. The matter was referred to the council, and the lane was pronounced a nuisance.

The council will be recommended to have a drain constructed on Thornton avenue to Oxford street and along Oxford to Maitland under the Local Improvement Act.

A complaint against a pool of foul water lying at the south end of Clarence street was referred to the council.

A communication from the medical health officer regarding the pond on the Hamilton road, near the city limits, was received. The pond is not drained in any way. No action was taken. A similar complaint regarding a pond between Maple and Florence streets, in the East End, was referred to the medical health officer.
