The latter sent boats to intercept the schooner's boats, and forbid them to approach nearer to the shore. There were a large number of insurgents about the place where the schooner intended to land her carg, and when saw the boats leaving the warship they poured a lively fusillade in their direction with rifles and cannons, but no one was hurt. At any rate warship quickly trained some of her guns on the insurgents, and very quickly silenced their fire. At the same time other of her guns were fired at the schooner, which sank shortly thereafter. The Austrians here are fill ed with the greatest resentment at what they term the insolence of the
