Well, we'd hed a fine voyage most of the way till we entered the Bay of Biscay, when things began to look kind o' threatenin'. Just about sunset one day a great steamer passed us, and everybody on board looked so gay and smilin' as could be, and gave is three hearty cheers, with wavin' handkerchiefs, as if they'd had a good passage so far, and were in high feather over it. She, the steamer, soon went out of sight, though, and we thought that was the last of her for us, and I couldn't help frettin' to think how much faster she sailed than the Black and we knew the worst was over. Well, just as we were rounding Point St. Matthew we came upon the signs of a wreck -- floatin' spars, Yardarm, 111 (Odom), 4 to 5 and out, 2; later on during the day we saw a queer lookin' object to the leeward of us, with something like a white flag flyin' from it. Our captain thought it looked suspicious, and ordered his men to bear away toward it, and after a while he a boat lowered and sent to see what it meant.

"It was well that we came upon it just as we did, for it proved to be a great chicken-coop, with a man and woman lashed to it, and both nearly dead from the cold, and bein' dashed about in the wild waves. BABIES AND THIEVES

Articles Transferred to the Children's Bonnets.

New York, Aug. 12.-Two babies, according to the police, aided their noon. The women were arrested and the store detectives say they were so skillful that they are evidently offenders. One of the women also had her 9-year-old son with her. The store detectives were first attracted to them when they kept taking off their babies' bonnets and laying them on the counters. Then one of the detectives noticed that when the bonnet was again placed upon the infant's head it contained some article from the counter.

The babies out their little hands to their bonnets and held them on tight, showing, the detectives say, that they were well trained. Then one woman would stand in front of the other while the stolen articles were being transferred from the bonnet to the front of the other woman's loose waist.
