He might have gone back home if she had not died long ago. Now, in spite of the many years that had passed over her grave, the memory of her came as strong, as sweet, as instinct with the visions. Presently he spoke aloud: wafter back into boyhood.

He did not lift the cloth after all, but having replaced it gently, he searched the wagon for a spade. It was found in the box fastened to the end of the wagon, and with the spade, in the gathering darkness, he dug a grave near the mountainside. Between the strokes of the spade he sent searching glances over the prairie and along the sloping ridges of the overlooking range, but there were no witnesses of his work save the coyotes that prowled like grey shadows across the sands. When the grave was ready he carried thither in his giant's arms the body of the woman on the mattress, and laid it thus to rest. When the sand was smoothed over the place, he carried thither quantities of great stones, and broken blocks of granite, to preserve the body from wild beasts.

It was dark when the heap of stones dead woman, a feathered head had sliphad been arranged in the form of a ped under the canvas side, a red face low pyramid, but though he had not had bent over him? tasted food for twenty-four hours, he lingered beside the grave, his head bent told himself that, had such been the as if still struggling with those unwont- case, his scalp-lock would not still adorn as if forced by a mysterious power eager to be gone. It came over him with disconcerting suddenness that he had lost a great deal of time, and that every moment spent in the covered wagon was fraught with imminent danger. It was not in his mind that the band of highwaymen might discover his hiding-place. Knowing them as he did, he was sure they would not come from their haunts or from the Santa Fe train in pursuit of him. But the Indians roamed the Panhandle, as much at home there as in their reservations—and here they were much more dangerous. Hal no savage eye discerned that wagon during the brilliant August day? The woman who feels that she can't afford a new autumn gown can without much difficulty convert her half-worn spring gown into a nodish "creation" with a tunic skirt and a waist rejuvenated with a vest of organdie and sleeves of black satin.

If the dress to be remodelled has a straight skirt, and it doubtles has, if it is last season's fashion, it may be brought up to date with a flounce or a double flounce of satin, moire or taffeta, the flounces giving it the line of the new Russian tunic.
