

with extreme rapidity. The banks of the river from hence are no longer steep and craggy, but open on every side into a beautiful champain country, whose woods, as we advance, become more lofty, and are every where intersected with villages and churches.

Trois Rivières, or Three Rivers, is the third town of any note in Canada, and stands upon the north side of the River St Laurence, a little way below, where it communicates with Lake St Peter. It contains 6 or 700 houses, and several churches, together with some English families. A small trade for furs is carried on here with those Indians who inhabit between Quebec and Montreal.

Lake St Peter begins three miles above the town of Three Rivers, in a flat low country, abounding with excellent timber, and extends 30 miles south-east, and is about 22 in breadth, receiving the waters of several
