

River and the Thames have their sources within eight miles of each other, both Rivers run nearly parallel to the north shore of Lake Erie, the Grand River east and the Thames west, the former falls into the Lake about 29 miles west of Fort Erie, and the latter into Lake Sinclair. The Thames is settled about 4 or 5 leagues from the Lake upwards. The whole of Upper Canada, with very few exceptions, is an extensive plain, interspersed with a few gentle elevations, and water communication is every where afforded for the conveyance of the produce of the country, excepting the carrying place at the great falls from Chippawa to Queenston, a distance of about 7 miles: but this break in the communication might easily be supplied by a navigable canal, which will no doubt be made when the commerce of the country is sufficiently advanced to defray the expence of the undertaking. The climate is very fine, and well accords with the fertility of the soil. The winter about York and Niagara has no resemblance in severity to what is experienced at Quebec. The snow does not continue above three months upon the ground with them, whereas we have it almost half the year. With respect to the government, it is an exact epitome of the British constitution, as may easily be seen by reference to the act by which the constitution was granted. The authors of the pamphlet dwell much at length upon the dangers to be apprehended from the overbearing power and influence of the Lieutenant Governor, and the wicked propensity inherent in this gentleman to exercise it. Every man in Upper Canada knows that no man's person or property ever was endangered by the power of the Governor, as they well know he possesses no such power, and therefore treat the assertion with the contempt it merits: But as persons at a great distance from Upper Canada may be influenced by such gross misrepresentations, and probably deterred from obtaining a
