"The present movement is of a different character entirely. In the Loos and Champagne fighting the allied loss in men was nearly 250,000 in the three days fighting. To have pursued this plan to the end would have depopulated the wealthy reserves of Russia, not to speak of the less numerous Allies in the west. Therefore, the 'push' was decided on both as a more certain means of saving men at the expense of shelil. The Allies' offensive has not stopped. It is still going on and is still gain-ing ground. There is a steady, almost uninterrupted creep toward the life lines of the Germans, which must be stopped entirely before the movement can be considered to be secure in their possession of Northern France.

From Hardecourt north, their lines have been steadily creeping onward, drawing nearer and nearer to Bapaume. The French have also made steady progress. This floes not hold true in the move directly in Peronne. For reasons which I have explained, there is no particular reason at this time why the French should sacrifice the men necessary to force their lines south of the Somme clear to the giver bank. But north of the river their brogress has, in the main, been without perious interruption.

Isonzo front until their armies farther north were former predictions of a rapid Allied advance in the west when once the German lines had been broken at any point. The Germans have their heaviest guns and greatest armies on this front, and are disputing the Allied advance with all the force they can bring to bear. The military expert of the New York Times gives an excellent review of the situation, as follows:—

"The word 'push' has frequently been used in describing the Allies' offensive, and no other word more graphically describes it. It is a push—nothing eise. The Allies had tried the blow, a sudden trenchant blow delivered with enormous power. This was the prevailing idea last September at Champagne and at Loos, and it was an admitted failure. They saw then if they had not seen before that no such taetics would be effective except over a narrow and shallow for the struct As a means of diving the

"Now the town of Maurepas has been added to the list of retaken positions.

Not only has the town been taken, but the French have advanced several hundreds of yards beyond the eastern outpkirts. They are thus preparing for a phovement against Combles, the most important town (except Peronne), in their immediate front. Slowly a wedge is being driven in south of Combles, which, unless the Germans are able to stop the advance, will soon be taken in the flank, just as the French have taken been town after the other in the progress one town after the other in the progress plish the purpose of starving England. A Cool Handle Cool Ironing

Chief among the exclusive features of the Asbestos Sad Iron is the fact that the handle is always cold. This is due to the Asbestos lined hood, which you clap over the heated base, thus preventing the radiating of heat to your hand. The only escape for the heat is where it is needed—the ironing surface.
