By OCTAVIA ROBERTS.

Wednesday morning Mrs. Atwater slept late after the gaiety of the regatta ball. Anna had watched her smilingly the night before, from the closely packed windows where the villagers and servants of the summer people pressed to see. As her mistress slid lightly down the room in a maze of cards and lanterns and paper flowers, Anna saw their possibilities on the morrow. Once she turned to her little charge, sleepily leaning against her side.
"The animals," said he, "have all arrived in fairly good condition, although Wiles is somewhat under the weather as a result of the long journey. She is suffering from what is popularly called the Monday morning blues. Nothing very serious, but enough to exact the greatest care being taken in her immediate keep."
