In order to do this, exports must be encouraged ant imports discouraged, and towards this end the depreciated price of ster ling exchange contributes m a marked dogree. To use a homely illustration -If a man in New York, purchasing by mail from an English catalogue desires a suit of clothes quoted at ten pounds, he would, with exchange at its present rate he will pay for that suit forty-one dollars and twenty cents, which represents the par value of ten putade stering today. This reduced rate is naturally a strong incentive to the purchases of Brittsh goods. If an English business concern wants a ton
