Incidents at Talavera.

The battle of Talavera, fought on July 27, 1809, between the Anglo-Spanish forces under Sir Arthur Wellesley, and the French, commanded really by Marshal Victor, although nominally under Joseph Bonaparte, was one of the more noteworthy of the earlier British successes in the Peninsula, and was hotly contested. Moreover, it was noteworthy for the first manifestation of the terms of mutual respect entertained towards each other by the French and English soldiers, terms leading later to quite a friendly intercourse whenever the circumstances of the situation might permit of a temporary relaxation of hostilities. It chanced that a small stream, tributary to the Tagus, flowed through a part of the battle-ground and separated the combatants. During a pause, produced by the heat of the weather and the exhaustion of the troops, men of both armies went to the banks of the rivulet for water. On either side they approached without fear, threw down their caps and muskets, chatted to each other like old acquaintances, and exchanged their brandy-flasks and wine-skins. For the moment all asperity of feeling was suspended. In fact, to a stranger they would have appeared more like an allied force than men hot from a ferocious conflict, and only gathering strength and energy to recommence it. But a yet nobler rivalry for the time existed. The interval was employed in carrying off the wounded, who lay intermingled upon the hard-fought field; and it is to the credit of both sides that each endeavored to extricate the common sufferers and to remove their unfortunate friends and enemies without distinction. But suddenly the bugles sounded, and the drums beat to arms. Many of the rival soldiery shook hands, parting with expressions of mutual esteem; and, ten minutes later, they were again at the bayonet's point.

Lord Melbourne's Retort

Foot, the actor, dining with some friends, a heated discussion arose between himself and a young nobleman. The latter sought to disparage Foot by asking what his father was. "A tradesman," said Foot. "Then, sir, it's a pity he did not make you one."

"And pray, let me ask what your father was, my lord?" "My father, Mr. Foot, was a gentleman." "Then, my lord, it's a pity he didn't make you one."

Lord Melbourne's retort to Mr. Black, editor of the Morning Chronicle, was perfect in its way. Melbourne was Prime Minister, and was constantly being attacked. Meeting in Pall Mall, they inquired after each other's health. Mr. B. explained that he was suffering from a bad cold. "Ah! Mr. B.," said Lord M., "you have been lying between damp sheets."

In the days when it was customary in Scotch churches for the minister to bow in succession to the chief heritors of his parish, Dr. Wightman, of Kirkmahoe, noticing that no male members of the family of Miller occupied their pew, refrained from bowing in that direction. Miss Miller (later Countess of Mar), who was present, on the first opportunity took the minister to task for his omission, and found him quite equal to the occasion. "I beg your pardon, Miss Miller," said he, "but surely you know that angel worship is not permitted in the Church of Scotland!"

Stealing the Crown Jewels.

Major-General Sir George Young, husband, whose official title is "Keeper of the Jewel House in the Tower of London," is in the unique position amongst high officers of State of having no superior in Court or Kingdom, save only His Majesty King George.

That is to say, he receives no orders except from the King personally, or conveyed to him by word of mouth through the Lord Chamberlain.

The origin of this rule (says General Young) is not far to seek. For other wise, in less settled days, anybody who was in a position to do so might have ordered the Keeper to hand over portions of the Regalia.

This has actually happened more than once in the past; while several attempts, more or less successful, have been made to steal the jewels outright.

Of these, the best known was that engineered by Colonel Blood in the reign of Charles II. Blood actually succeeded in getting possession of the crown and sceptre; but General Young is careful to point out that any modern Raffles bent upon emulating his exploit may certainly count on being gulfoothed or electrocuted.
