Woman Who Helped to Defraud man of $500 is Shot and Mortally Wounded

(By A. W. L'Amoureux) Paris, Aug. 24.—All Paris misses the Prince of Wales, and espec-ially the humble folk of the quarter in which he lived. Every day the shopkeepers of the Rue Rude were on the alert for a glimpse of the Prince. The coulder whose trade kept him at the window was the most fortunate. "I saw him every day," he says with justifiovery any," he says with justin-able pride. "Every time he went-out he passed my shop, and let me tell you be never fulled to give a glance at it. He was a charming young man and not a bit proud. One day a little girl-I saw it with my own eyes—ran into him as she was playing. The Prince held her to keep her from falling and asked her so pleasantly if she had burt herself."

Still more precise are the impressions of the news agent at the corp of the Rue Rude and the Avenue de Grande Armee, for the Prince us often to buy picture postcards f her shop. When the Prince came live in Paris she purchased Eng statoinery in the hope that she w some day be honored by Royal pati some day be honored by Royal patror age. Honored she was, but, in he own words, "the Prince seemed to tak no interest in the English goods I dis played. He bought French illustrate cards, which he chose himself, and could see him smile with pleasur whenever he found a card which represented some historic monument he whenever he found a card which represented some historic monument had just visited. Every time he camto my shop he bought picture post cards; every street in Paris must have hen represented among his purchases." Then the good lady told with pride a more personal incident—how several others; how she had run forward to pick them up, and how her Royal customer had excused himself, "Si gentiment." "He was charming, and not a bit proud" she ended, and that is the verdict of all.

Tragic Result of Jest. From a village near Roubaix comes story of an extraordinary jest tha ad a tragic result. At Wattrelos lived couple named Delmotte. The hus-

a couple named Delmotte. The husband was a heavy drinker, which led to frequent quarrels. One day, his wife being away from home, Delmotte asked a Madame Foucart, proprietress of a neighboring cafe, to dine with him. Madame Foucart hesitated at first, but when Delmotte assured her that a number of friends were coming she consented. When she arrived she found Delmotte and a single male friend. The other guests had not yet arrived. Her host suggested a cup of ceffee, which she drank.

After that, according to her story, the remembered nothing till she found herself entirely stripped, her wands bound, and her body covered with tar, there on a bed in Definite's house. In this guise she was driven by Delnotte and a friend, who pretended to et of the village. This extraord y story reached the ears of Del te's wife as soon as she returned in litter resentment at this public sult to herself, as she conceived Madame Delmotte walked to the pay shop, pawned her wedding ring, a then took to flight. She was arrested
