The investigation will still go on, however, and Mr. Oborne is hopeful that something may be learned to throw light on the cause of the peculiar mishap. That no injuries to passengers followed the derailment was due, Mr. Oborne thought, to the solid construction of the coaches. "That piece of roadbed is as perfect as mechanical skill can make it," said "It is straight for miles, and there was so little vibration on the engine when the cars left the rails that the engineer said he could have written a letter in his cab. The rails were all tle-plated, an added precaution, making a spreading of the steel an almost impossible occurrence, and all of the plates were in their proper places."
