

Job Creation

- Reconsider the common belief that our current transportation systems and the construction of new infrastructure create jobs and long-lasting benefits to the economy.
- Consider the potential economic, social, and employment benefits that could be derived from the restructuring of present transportation systems, in particular, for those sectors involved in construction of infrastructure that need to adapt to new markets.

Partnerships with Developing Countries and Countries in Transition

- Form strategic partnerships between developed and developing economies in order to create and implement new approaches to sustainable transportation. Specific initiatives with respect to access to information, impact assessment and evaluation, clean and resource-efficient technology, and financial resources should be strongly supported.