HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

MY MAY CHRISTIE Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate LXXXII—Foolish Alice.

Giving me no time to answer, Tony foolish, vain little Alice in her husband's absence, and then to blackmail her, was probably a charitable construction of his motives— Pullman car. The door slammed behind him, and the train began to move. I was left to my own worried thoughts. So Tony was going up to town to meet Alice Anstruther! Oh, the hopeless, helpless folly of some women!
"Is the woman crazy?" I asked my-"Is the woman crazy?" I asked myself repeatedly, during my solitary walk home. "Can't she realize the true nature of the man, when his character —or lack of it—is evident for all the world to see? Is she so infatuated with him that she's blind, deaf and dumb to warnings?" about it. I longed to take my whole sex by the warnings?"

Yes, Alice knew his shortcomings. She must know them. And yet she persisted in playing with fire.

Not that Tony's feeling for her was an ardent one. Upon the contrary, he was singularly cool and calculating. le was of the earth earthy.
But that he had some game up his sleeve, I felt certain. To compromis MEDICAL CARDS

Now could she be such an arrant little fool?

The newspapers were filled daily with the newspapers were filled daily with the doings of rascals such as Tony. If it weren't for foolish, credulous little dupes like Alice, Tony's kind would not exist. That was the maddening part houlders, and shake it violent I've often noticed, by a curio of fate, that it's frequently the best of women who are duped and tricked by men. Not that Alice came into this category. There was nothing noble or heroic in Alice's calibre.

But that she must be infatuated with Tony was too evident. Last night's silly scene—their kisses by the fireside—oh, she ought to be slapped!

Not that there was any actual wickedness in Alice. She'd never burn her boats. Fear—the great bogey, "what will people say?" would hold her back—and not any actual sense of right and wrong.

wrong.

There are lots of women just like Alice. Incapable of "la grande pas-sion"—incapable of any deep emotion— enjoying the thrill of playing with fire, out-salamander-like-coming through But the fact that she was dining tete-a-tete with Tony in town tonight, wor-ried me extremely. I'd promised her husband to look after her, in his ab-sence. She was starting her career of freedom with a vengeance.

There was something sinister aton in There was something sinister, too, in the thought that she had wired to n for a hundred dollars. I knew now that Mr. Anstruther had nothing to do with the sending of that urgent telegram. How stupid I had been, to think he'd had a thing to do with it! If, on ar-rival in New York, he'd found himself short of money, he'd only to ring up his bank, or cash a check—— Besides, a man setting off on a voyage would not be short of money. He'd have travelers' checks, credentials— The money was for Alice. And the smart Fifth avenue hotel was the spot I'd sent it to.

Oh, I was angry with myself, for being Passing the postoffice, for a moment I almost entered and demanded the cancelling of the wire. But commonsense prevented me. It was too late. My action would only cause talk. The vire had been dispatched. Brighter thoughts came to me as I plashed along the muddy roads. Alice, perhaps, had wanted to purchase a new dinner dress. Hence her request. The last train from town arrived at the little country station at half-past twelve. I'd send the car to meet her. Or perhaps she'd be home sooner.
Tony's information about dining with Alice might be merely a bluff. He send the car. Then I remembered that the car was out of the garage!

That seemed a little odd. The chauffeur hadn't been well, late It wasn't likely that he would hoose to go joy-riding in the rain.
"Pray that it isn't stolen," I n mured, wondering what would happen next in this quiet country spot, which
