After the shooting, and while his wounds were being examined, White said that he was fired at by another man besides Fuget. This man, he said, was a large man with heavy black whiskers, who stood in the alley leading up into Chinatown, and fired three shots at him, after which he ran away up the alley. Afterward, on being more closely questioned about this man, White refused to say anything more in regard to him, or to give his name, even if he knew it. Many persons who were the three dignors hood at the time of the shooting are quite certain that more than two men were engaged in it. They say that it seems almost impossible that two men, armed with common six shooters, could have done such rapid firing, and when the men were taken up and the pistory ression of surprise on seeing they were not self-cockers. Several bullets struck the iron shutters of the store, and the men who screened themselves in the doorways seem to have occupied a tolerably hot pestion. By some it is supposed that the men were hunting each other at the time, as but a minute before the shooting begin white came to the door of a billiard saloon near by and peered in as though looking for some one. Both men were formerly residents of San Francisco.
