

OUTPOURT MAN'S BEST FRIEND SAYS PITCHER

Trinity Fisherman Tells How Tanlac Restored Wife's Health After Her Case Had Been Declared Hopeless.

"I simply can't find words to express my gratitude for all that Tanlac has done for my wife, for it has restored her to health after her case had been given up as hopeless," declared Eli Pitcher, well-known and prosperous fisherman, living at Windward Bay, when in St. John's, recently.

"I don't think there was a day during the last six years that she didn't suffer untold agonies after every meal on account of stomach trouble. Even a bit of fish and a few raws would send her to bed in her system and she would bleed with gas something terrible. She had to keep her body and hardly able to get up and she would be very weak and frail.

"She had headaches that almost drove her distracted and such pains across the small of her back that she could hardly stand it. Her nerves were so upset that the least little excitement would make her tremble all over, and she steadily got worse all the time.

"Finally we had to send her to a hospital in St. John's where she stayed for five months, but she was told that she need never expect to get better.

"We saw by the paper that Tanlac was helping others, so I went to Connors and got some, and it proved just the medicine my wife needed. She has taken five bottles now and really she is like a different woman. She can eat just anything she wants and never has any pain or gas afterwards. Headaches and pains in the back are a thing of the past. Her nerves are steady and she sleeps like a child at night."

"She is so much stronger that she is able to do the housework and when I left home to go on this trip she was working out in the garden. She is always praising Tanlac and is only too pleased to tell her experience for the benefit of others.

"I never expect to be without Tanlac in the house after this, for in times of sickness it's the Outport man's best friend."

How to Become a Centenarian.

Miss Sarah Ann McGuinness has just celebrated her 104th birthday in a home for the Aged in New York.

"She is still hale and hearty, and buckled as she said: "When I reached seventy I was just beginning to feel smart and spry."

"I remember," she continued, "when was a young girl in my teens an old man who had just reached seventy said that from hence on he was living on borrowed time. I thought that rather a cutting remark, but when I reached that age myself I came to the conclusion that seventy was a very spry age, indeed."

Her clear blue eyes need no glasses, her mouth shows no trace of old age, her feet are as firm as those of a young girl, and she is in a very youthful fashion.

"Tell me about the many things you have done since you have reached seventy," said the interviewer.

"It seems as if I have been busier these years than any others," laughed Miss McGuinness. "I was born in County Kerry, Ireland, came to New York at the age of nine and at eighteen earned my living as a seamstress."

"At seventy I was still sewing for my living. But from seventy till ninety I believe I made more dresses and sewed on more buttons than I did from thirty to seventy. You see my fingers kept spry. During this last war I knit too many sweaters and socks that I lost count of them. I think they people keep talking about the 'war' business. It seems to me that the best way to work is just to keep busy every day."

"How do I spend my days? I lead the blind old folks about, read the papers to them and visit the sick every day. I fold and count all the rags and sheets and sew—why I spend at least two hours every day sewing on buttons."

"And your recipe for keeping spry at 104?" the interviewer asked.

"Simply this: Live each day by itself. Eat good plain food, sleep eight or ten hours and, above all, don't worry."

Shocked the Bishop.

An English bishop, visited America during his visit, he stayed at a country house. The negro butler was instructed to say "My Lord" to the bishop. At dinner the bishop, being out of his feed, refused the soup and then refused the fish. The entire was one of America's choicest dishes, but the bishop refused it. The negro butler astonished both the bishop and his host by remarking, "My God, them's 'errapin'." But the greater shock came with the piece of resistance, a sirloin of beef. The butler wished to inform there was nothing more cooking and came out with, "My God, there's no hereafter."

An Old Sea-Dog.

An old sea-dog has passed over to the farther shore. A son of Britain, upon whose shoulders rested the manly work of the long and illustrious company of men of the sea from Drake and Hawkins to the immortal Nelson, sleeps his long sleep, the salt breezes of Devon and of Norfolk still in his nostrils and of action stilled only by Death.

It is given to few men to live a fuller life than that which has just closed with the passing of Lord Fisher. Fewer still have retained the sagacity, the daring and the supreme energy of youth until the last hour of the evening of their days. One can almost, without irreverence, picture the old sailor disputing with Charon as to the navigation of the Styx or in flaming language denouncing him as a profiteer if, perchance, the price of the ferryman's toll has been raised by an obol.

Lord Fisher had the honest, downright and implacable nature of the Englishman. Sycophancy and the handing of subtle diplomatic phrases soured on his stomach. Jingoism covered him with a healthy shame and hero worship was outside the limits of his understanding. He would have his countrymen cultivate the characteristics that dominated his life—self-reliance, fertility of resource, fearlessness of responsibility and power of initiative.

His violent letters to the Press, which, however, were softened in sentiment, in spite of their perhaps too vigorous epithets, by an undercurrent of humor and the loveliness of his sturdy patriotism, gave the superficial observer the impression that he was too temperate, too volcanic for balanced judgment. Those who thought thus minimized the depth of the passion from which his tirades flowed or the sincerity of conviction which compelled his outbursts.

Yet in normal days and in the routine of the seaman's life Lord Fisher was a quiet, self-contained man, going his own road at his own gait, and asking no favor of any one, ever pushing forward with an iron determination, uttering neither whine nor threat in the blackest hour of adversity, and striking swiftly and mercilessly when the need for action arose.

Lord Fisher rendered two supreme services to the country he loved so well and served so faithfully. He re-created the British Navy and at a critical moment he mooted the Grand Fleet in quarters where it was able to command the North Sea, itself unassailable.

Forty-eight hours before war was declared in 1914 the British Fleet sauntered out into the English Channel ostensibly bent on an ordinary practice cruise. No one save the admiral in command knew in what direction it was shaping its course. But on the

Football League Honors "The King."

The officers and representatives of the various clubs constituting the Newfoundland Football League, called last evening upon Mr. Mark Chaplin, Hon. President of the League, at the home of Mr. H. Y. Mott, where he is at present staying. In a speech which paid tribute to Mr. Chaplin's great service to the cause of football, Mr. W. J. Higgins, the newly elected President, who has succeeded him in office, stated that the representatives of the League teams had decided on the occasion of Mr. Chaplin's retirement from the Presidency to mark their approval of his work by asking his acceptance of a souvenir which might prove of some little service on his journey abroad, and which during his absence would serve as a daily reminder of his associations for so many years. The souvenir took the form of a magnificent travelling bag, which contained a silver plate on which was inscribed:

Woman Badly Burned.

Passengers who arrived by the Prospero tell of a serious fire, which occurred at Piley's Island on Friday night last, in which a woman, whose name they are unable to give, was almost burnt to death. It appears that the woman was alone in the house when it took fire, and while attempting to save some personal belongings, she was badly burned about the face and body. A doctor was called to attend her, and she was hurried to the hospital at Piley's Island for treatment. The house and all its contents were destroyed.

Fire at Floating Dock.

At 7.25 last evening the Central and West-End Fire Companies were called by telephone message to the Southside, where fire had been discovered in the engine-room of the floating dock. Whilst the firemen were quickly on the scene their services were not needed as the watchman and other people around the premises had extinguished the blaze with a few buckets of water. The fire was caused by a live coal falling from a stove on to a wood floor. The damage done was only slight.

Popular Odd Fellow Visits North Sydney.

North Sydney, July 14.—John Craig, of Yarmouth, who has held the position of Grand Master and about all the other offices in the gift of the Grand and Subordinate Lodge of the Independent Order of Oddfellows in the maritime provinces, has recently returned from his annual visit to Newfoundland. On this trip he makes it a point to visit all the Encampments and Lodges, and the occasion is a most enjoyable one throughout. Mr. Craig at one time did business in Sydney, and later operated a drug store in the town of North Sydney, removing to Yarmouth nearly forty years ago. Here he has built up a large business and grown independently wealthy. In visiting various lodges he has frequently travelled several thousands of miles in one year. It has been customary for years to have what is known as Craig day in the Newfoundland lodges, to each of whom Mr. Craig has presented Newfoundland Victory Bonds, and the proceeds are used for jewels of the order which are presented while on his visits. During the last trip he visited all the lodges and encampments, and banquets and presentations were the order of the day, with degree work by teams of various lodges.

On his visit to Newfoundland various presentations were made to Mr. Craig, including mounted caribou heads set with silver tips made from caribou horns, cuff links of Labradorite, a rare and beautiful agate silver tray, and many unique gifts. In short the trip was mutually enjoyed and proved a great pleasure to visitor as well as to visited.
