MISS EMERSON GAINS FREEDOM
Plans of Militant Suffragettes Upset by Government's Sudden Action.

Certain of the more militant friends of Americans, who were displeased at Mrs. Emerson's abandoning the campaign to force intervention by the American Embassy, planned to take away the suffragette without her mother's knowledge in an interview without the mother's moderate influence.

The militants placed a relay of pickets to watch for Miss Emerson's release, but they were forestalled by her unexpectedly announced that she would be set at liberty tomorrow.

Miss Emerson, who was taken from the jail in a motor ambulance, was cheered by a large number of suffragettes, who had gathered in momentary expectation of the release of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst.

THE BATH

Since there is a right way and a wrong way of doing most things in this busy world, it is just as well to try to do the right thing for baby in the small things. In the end it saves time and worry, and you may find some of the old school grumbling in perfectly modern fashion over the length of time consumed in "fussing with the baby."

I am not claiming that my way is the only right way. But if my experience and knowledge help one or two mothers over the strange, new road of babydom, the purpose of the column is accomplished. Just the thought of giving baby his first bath gives the little new mother a wonderful thrill. At first it is a thrill of joy at doing something all by herself for the new little body in her trembling hands, the thrill becomes one of terror. She wonders how she will ever get him into the tub, and once in, how on earth she is to wash him. It is a nervous ordeal, that first bath. It is just as well to have some person finish the performance before the mother gets too tired. Next day she can do more.

One realizes the importance of having everything right at hand for the first bath. Any waiting or hurrying after things is very bad for baby, and worrying for mother. It doesn't matter what room you choose to give baby his bath in, so long as it is warm. Not too warm. Many a girl has fainted just because she treated the new baby to boiler-room atmosphere. Seventy-five to 80 degrees Fahrenheit is about right, with no drafts.

Get the table ready first. Place on it a pad, then a large, soft bath towel, then a smaller damask towel or a large diaper. Place the baby tub on a chair beside the table. The water should be 100 degrees Fahrenheit. Slip the left arm under the table and shoulders and grasp his arm at the shoulder with your left hand. With the right hand dry his face. Powder the water. Lower him gradually into the tub. Keep your left hand in the baby's position, and with your right wash his head and face. Do not hesitate to use pure castile soap on his face and wash, still keeping the left arm as support.

Lift him out and lay him on the towels. Wrap him up quickly, covering him completely. Uncover his head, and pat his face gently. Uncover his arms, then his body and legs. He will be almost dry. The towels absorb all the moisture before you have all folds of the skin. Dress him quickly, slipping his garments over his feet whenever possible. Once you have tried this method, you will never attempt to bathe him the old way. How hold that slippery, squirming little object on a pair of wobbly knees passes my comprehension. Let the table bear his weight and move it around, and you have all your strength for the dressing.

JACK RABBIT LEARNS WISDOM

III.

Jack Rabbit was not a very wise animal, but he was wise enough to know that he was not wise, and so one morning he said to himself: "I have been told that old Mr. Fox is a very wise beast, and I think I will see if I cannot get him to take me as a pupil and teach me some things that will be useful to me."

He knew where the fox lived, for he had often seen him going into a hole near a rock on the side of the hill, and it was not long before he had run the distance to Mr. Fox's home.

"Mr. Fox," he called, "Mr. Fox, I wish to see you for a moment; will you not come out of your hole so that I may talk with you, for I wish to get from you some of your wisdom."

It was some minutes before he heard any answer, and then from another part of the field a long distance away he heard Mr. Fox answer. "Why, it is Jack Rabbit. And why do you come to me to learn wisdom?"

"Because you are the wisest of the animals," said Jack Rabbit, "which fact you have just proved by having two doors to your house, so that while your enemies watch at one you can escape by the other."

"You are not slow to learn wisdom," said the fox, "since you quickly saw the value of the two doors to my home, and if you really wish to learn wisdom from me I shall be glad to teach you. I am, however, very busy today, as some dogs were here yesterday, and I have time to teach you only a short lesson, and then, since I am sure the dogs are coming back, it will be safer for both of us if we stay in our holes for a day or two."

"Well," said Jack Rabbit, "since your time is so short, you can make the lesson a brief one, and then I will run home. What is the most important thing for me to know? Teach me that first, for I may at any time have use for the knowledge."

"The most important thing for you to know," said the fox, "is that it is best to be wise as well as to be strong. That is, something better is assured. That is, do not give up what you have already for something that is more pleasing but less certain. There are a great many animals, and not a few men, who have not learned this lesson, and the absence of this knowledge in others may at some time be of use to you. That will be all the lesson for this morning, and when you have made use of that wisdom, come back and I will teach you some more."

With this the fox turned and ran into his hole, and the rabbit started for home. Mr. Rabbit had not gone far, however, before he heard sounds in the wood, and almost before he knew it a dog was upon him, and ran as fast as he could, he could not get away from him. At last he stopped and allowed the dog to catch up with him. "Why are you chasing me?" he asked the dog.

"Because," answered the dog, "my master wishes you for his dinner and he sent me to drive you past the point where he is standing in the wood in order that he might shoot you."

"Why should he wish to eat me?" said the rabbit. "I would be scarcely enough for one meal, and he will have spent all your time and his powder and shot, besides all the time which he will have to wait for you to drive me before him. Why does he not, instead, kill the bear which lives up on the mountain, whose meat would last him for many days and whose fur would make him a nice rug? Then he would be amply repaid for his time, and if you could assist him in so great a feat you would become his favorite dog."

"Is there a bear on the side of the mountain?" asked the dog.

"Indeed there is," said Mr. Rabbit, "and I would be glad to show you the opening to his cave, and more than that, I would be glad to go in and tell him you wish to see him."

"Would you do me so great a service?" said the dog. "I should win much praise from my master if I could help him get a bear."

"It is not far up in the mountain," said the rabbit, "and if we hurry your master will not think you have wasted the time you have spent talking to me." So Mr. Rabbit ran along front of the dog up the mountain until they came to a big opening in the rocks.

"Here," said the rabbit, "is where the bear lives, and I will go in and deliver the message that you wish to see him. And so saying Mr. Rabbit disappeared into the hole in the rocks. The dog, as he stood outside the opening, said to himself: "I am certainly made a good bargain with the rabbit, for in exchange for him I am to get the bear for my master, and I shall be a favorite of all the pack." But the he waited a long time the bear did not appear, and he began to fear that his master would beat him for being gone so long. At last he became so worried that he walked a circle round the hole, and when he did he saw that it was not a bear den at all, but that the hole just led crookedly thru the rock and out behind a stone. Then he realized that Mr. Rabbit had escaped by making him think that in giving him up he was getting something better.

Next day Mr. Rabbit went again to the fox's hole and told him the story of the dog and the bear.

"You are already wise in one thing," said the fox, "in that having wisdom you know how to apply it. Come again tomorrow and I will teach you another lesson."

BILL IS DRASTIC AND RETROGRADE

Dr. Pyne's Proposed Legislation Is Frowned Upon by Trustees.

School Board Want Education Bill Toned Down Slightly.

Trustee Fairbairn started the board of education advisory committee yesterday afternoon. He told them he had been handed a copy of the new education bill which was received by the Toronto branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and that the bill was both drastic and retrograde so far as Toronto was concerned.

As the board passed its second reading some prompt action should be taken by the committee. The bill would reduce the number of elected members of the board of education from 12 to 8, and the members of the board of trustees from 12 to 8. The bill also provided for the election of trustees by the ratepayers of the city, and for the election of trustees by the ratepayers of the city.

The members of the committee agreed with Trustee Fairbairn, who had been conferred with by the minister of education, and that Toronto was likely to be excepted from some of the provisions of the act. Principal McKay stated that the clause was introduced reducing the number of elected representatives in technical education boards because in many municipalities a difficulty has been found in securing the requisite number of committee members called for by the act.

Trustee Ellis, chairman of the advisory committee, was authorized to accompany Principal McKay to present the views of the committee to Hon. Dr. Pyne this morning.

OUT OF THE ATTIC

THE existing rage for antiques has unearthed some examples of old furniture manufacture that, in spite of time, mold, decay and dust, are better liked than present-day styles, or the horrors of the last generation.

The best mechanical skill is now employed in reviving the graceful results are beautiful.

The old-fashioned furniture was made to hold something more than the weight of a baby and an antique table is for use, and a table indeed. It must be admitted that there is sometimes a straight-backed comfortableness about the chairs that is disconcerting, but no possessor of antique will ever acknowledge this.

The imitations of old patterns are startling in their resemblance to originals, so that experts may easily be deceived. Therefore, be suspicious of all bargains in antiques.

Go, rather, to your neighbor's attic, or to the second-hand dealer, for the pie crust table, the three-cornered cupboard or the "high-boy" that you must have to make life worth living, and pay these good people a reasonable sum for their art treasures.

Often they will only need re-dressing and that can best be done at home. Even if they must be restored, it is unlikely that the cost will be as much as the new imitation and you will have an article that will add interest to your home. There is no wood so satisfying as mahogany, but there are some others that approach it in beauty.

Cherry is often found in beautiful shades in old pieces, and oak, dark black walnut, striped of its hair-cloth covering and rubbed to a fine, smooth gloss, comes out rich, and comfortable.

It is surprising what one can do without professional help in restoring old furniture, once started. It is a most fascinating work, too. There are many suggestions for stains, varnishes and polishes to be found in all books of antique furniture. If you can find the time, you will save worry and money in doing your own restoring. The desire to appropriate the fine old knobs and claw feet seems to be active in nearly every upholsterer. A cherry rocker, prized for years because the top was delicately carved, at last was sent to a upholsterer.

When it was brought home, instead of the three dainty roses in the top piece, there was an ugly Roman scroll. So cunningly matched was it that it was hardly possible to find where the one had been cut out and the other set in.

The workman declared nothing had been changed—that the chair was exactly as he had received it—and we could not prove that he was the guilty one. This is just one experience. Every lover of "attic furniture" can tell a dozen to go with it.

MANXMEN FORM AN ASSOCIATION
Natives of Isle of Man in Toronto Have United.

The Toronto Manx Society, an organization composed of former residents of the Isle of Man, now living in Toronto, came into being Monday night when about forty Manxmen and women met in Forsters' Hall, College street, for the purpose of organizing a Toronto branch. The society, which is of English origin, has about twelve branches in Canada at the present time, and as there are a large number of former residents of the Isle in this city, it was thought proper that a branch should be formed here. Many of those present, who, they had practically come from the same villages and towns in the Isle, were unacquainted with the fine old gathering last evening, and many pleasant events in their younger days were recalled. The following officers were elected:

President, A. Callow; vice-president, Mrs. R. H. Clarke; treasurer, W. Fick. A meeting, to be announced in the local papers, will be held three weeks hence to attend.

ACCIDENTAL DEATH.
"Death," due to an accidental fall on Simcoe street, was the verdict returned by the jury in the case of John Falvey, who died in the police cells on April 4. The adjourned inquest was held before Chief Coroner Johnson at the morgue last night. The evidence of the doctors who attended Falvey at St. Michael's Hospital was heard. Further evidence from the police that took Falvey in charge shows that there was no negligence on their part.
