THE GOLDEN LAMP.

A Tale of Fisherman's Folly.

CHAPTER II.

The room with the five windows, in the centre one of which stood the Golden Lamp, was an old dining hall. The oaken walls were hung with large and valuable paintings; and from the centre of the ceiling was suspended a great chandelier. At the end of this room a fire was burning in the open chimney; and near the rug, in front of the fire, was placed a round dining table, laid for three. Leaning over this table, to arrange some exotic flowers in a centre vase, was the beautiful lamplighter who had attracted John Westcott's attention an hour ago.

No antique room, with so lovely a figure placed there would have better represented a former century; a period, one might say, in which Fisher's Folly was the abode of beauty and fashion. The girl was plainly dressed; the fair hair was drawn back from the broad forehead into a Grecian knot, and the dark velvet robe fitted closely to the tall and slender form. Her face was undeniably handsome; but there was something more than mere beauty in the large brown eyes and resolute mouth; each feature expressed that quick intelligence which awakens confidence. It was the face of a woman with character—a woman likely to exhibit resource in a difficult situation. Such was Marian Carter, the head partner in the old house. Having touched the flowers softly with her long expressive fingers—a touch of the butterfly's wing in tenderness—she turned away and moved through folding doors into an adjoining room. It was a small room, but with panelled walls of dark oak, like the dining hall. In an armchair near the fire sat Mr. Carter with his head resting on his hand. His face was more troubled in expression; since his interview with Westcott he appeared to have even more realized the magnitude of the calamity which was pending. As Marian approached him, however, he made a strong effort to overcome his depression.

"Is all ready, Marian?" said he, with cheerfulness in his tone.

"Everything."

"Is the lamp lighted."

"Why, father, do you think I would neglect that? Would it not be too thoughtless," said she laughingly, "on an occasion like this?"

As Marian seated herself beside him, her father said: "how strange that John Westcott should have returned tonight."

"It is strange," said the girl, with a smile. "And what is still stranger," she added, with a slight blush, "some one—I think it must have been Mr. Westcott—was standing below the window when I lit the lamp. Is he likely to prove a friend?"

"Ah! I was wondering," said Mr. Carter. "He has the character of being an excellent and shrewd young fellow. But I fear," he went on, "that even if he had his uncle's financial genius, he would find it no easy matter to"—He stopped abruptly; for at this moment Westcott came in. The change in his appearance, now that the rough costume was gone, was remarkable. Mr. Carter scarcely recognized him; there was little of the sailor even in his face, and nothing in his manner. He had all the style of a refined gentleman. The merchant rose from his chair and formally presented him.

Had she seen him, thought Westcott, when standing in the square below the windows? There was something in her look, something in her very attitude towards him, which made him doubt if he was an entire stranger. He had recognized her; and he had conjectured, while in conversation with the merchant, that the beautiful "vision" at the Golden Lamp could be no other than Marian Carter. But he had no time for more than this passing reflection. The dinner was announced; the folding doors were thrown open, and they passed through and took their seats at the table.

The first object that attracted Westcott's glance was the old lamp. Marion's look followed his. She smilingly asked him: "Do you remember it?"

"No; I had forgotten the house," said he. "I was seldom here."

"Ah! It is strange you should have forgotten the lamp," said Marian.

"So I am thinking," Westcott replied. "The workmanship is exquisite. But," he added, "Is it not a lantern?"

"It can be used as such. It is called the golden lamp. It was called so long before I was born. It belonged, as you may have guessed to Mr. Girdlestone. He used to call it mine. It has stood where it now stands, I believe, for nearly a 100 years. —But the lantern," said the girl, "can easily be detached; it hangs from a hook, as you see, under the dome. I have forbidden anyone to touch it. I trim and light it myself all the year round."

"No wonder," replied Westcott gallantly, "that it burns so brightly."

"Not for the world," Marian went on "would I miss doing so. It is to me a sacred duty."

Westcott could not repress a smile. "What reason can you have. Miss Carter." said he, "for being such a conscientious lamplighter?

Marian looked serious. "It was Mr. Girdlestone's wish," said Marian, with a glance toward her father, and, receiving no look of disapproval, she added: "as long as the lamp is lighted—it was a sort of superstition with him—luck will not leave the house."

As soon as the two men were alone over their wine—though they could see and hear Marian at the piano, for the folding doors stood open—John Westcott turned to Mr. Carter and said: "There is something about that lamp—and I hope you will not think me too inquisitive—which interests me. May I look at it more closely?"

The merchant readily acquiesced, and the young man, stepping across the room bent over the lamp, and, had not his back been turned to Mr. Carter, the expression of keen excitement which came over his face might have puzzled him. Seating himself once more opposite to his host, after a somewhat lengthy examination of the lamp, Westcott said: "There is a large key, I observe hanging behind the lantern is there any tradition attached to that?"

"I cannot tell you," said Mr. Carter. "No one knows."

"Do you mean, sir that it fits no lock?"

A slight smile crossed the merchant's face.

"You know how curious women are." said he. "I need scarcely tell you, John, that Marian has tried every keyhole in the house. She has not solved the mystery."

"Have you no theory, Mr. Carter, concerning that key?

"None."

"Has it never occurred to you that it might have been the key," said Westcott, "to my uncle's financial genius?"

"Ah, that is a shrewd remark," said Mr Carter thoughtfully. "But let me tell you," he added, "something about that strange man. It will interest you. No one, unless it was his Indian servant knew Mr. Girdlestone more intimately than I did."

That eager expression again passed over Westcott's face, but it escaped Mr. Carter's notice. After a short pause he began; and the low sound of music in the adjoining room added to the earnest tone of his voice.

"Through a long life, John, your uncle had lived alone in this old house—alone with this Indian. During office hours he often occupied his room down stairs—the room in which that fine portrait hangs; but he received no visitors there. All matters of business were arranged in my room—in the room, at least, which became mine when I was taken into partnership. There, in his magic way, he settled the question of finance. No one was ever allowed to pass beyond the staircase. Even Marian, to whom he was greatly attached, never visited the upper stories, except when Mr. Girdlestone took her to look at this lamp. At 6 o'clock every evening the great hall door was locked and bolted behind us—that is myself and the clerks—by the native servant, and never, under any circumstance was it opened until 9 the next morning."

"An odd character," said Westcott, in an undertone.

"This eccentricity led to all sorts of rumors. It was generally believed that Mr. Girdlestone was a man of great wealth; and his excessive caution and secret ways suggested a hoarding disposition. It was thought that his gold was stored in great heaps in the garrets. I often heard these tales. But I have since convinced myself that these rumors were unfounded."

"You discovered nothing?"

"I will tell you," said Mr. Carter "exactly what happened. During the years that I served Mr. Girdlestone—more than 20 in all—I never knew him to be absent for one day from his desk. There were times when he remained in the counting house only an hour or two; those were what I called his restless days; for I could hear him pacing this room, which is just above the office, with a peculiar tread which I have never forgotten. It was the only exercise he took, and it always foreboded some new and frequently gigantic financial scheme. I sometimes fancy when I am very busy, that I can still hear him walking up and down."

Westcott looked about him. "In this room?" he interposed. "You believe it was here?"

"So it sounded to me," was Mr. Carter's reply. "But it is a strange old house: and I have sometimes thought," he added, "that there may be rooms upstairs or downstairs of which we know nothing.—But let me finish. One afternoon, towards the hour for locking up. I heard a groan. It came from Mr. Girdlestone's room. I went in, and found my old partner leaning forward upon his desk with his head sunk upon his arms. That was his last day in the counting house—he died that night." Mr. Carter paused, with a distressed look upon his face. The details of that painful incident were passing vividly through his mind. Presently he concluded: "No sooner was Mr. Girdlestone dead, strange to say, than his Indian servant absconded. No one knows where he has gone. He seemed to me like a man who had received some shock, I could make nothing of him. Doubtless he possessed a a great deal of information about his master. If Mr. Girdlestone was a hoarder of gold he must have found it out. But I, who have lived here ever since my partner's death, have discovered nothing. And as to the mystery, John, about that key," he added, "who can solve it?"

Westcott made no reply, but he sat watching the merchant attentively; and he soon noticed a look of drowsiness coming over him. The fatigue and anxiety of the last few days were beginning to tell upon his overwrought brain. The more sleepy he became the more wakeful grew the expression on Westcott's face.

As soon as he had assured himself that Mr. Carter was asleep, the young man rose from his chair, stepped softly across the room, and approached Marian's side. Standing where the light fell strongly upon him, some paces from her, he whispered: "Don't stop playing, Miss Carter; your father will wake. I have a secret to tell you, and much will depend, within the next few minutes, upon your presence of mind. But do not be alarmed," he hastened to add. "Play as you are playing now and listen."

Marian was a true musician; and at the moment that John Westcott came and stood there she was carried away by the enchanting effect of some melody. His unexpected appearance startled her; it was like being suddenly roused out of a dream. She could not hide her agitation; even the flood of harmony threatened to fall into discord. A false note was struck, and then, in a troubled voice, she murmured, as she half lifted her eyes from the keys: "A secret to tell me?"

Westcott sat down, though without approaching nearer, for his first thought was to reassure the girl. "Do not be distressed. Miss Carter, place confidence in me, Can you not—for your father's sake? He needs a friend."

The girl fixed her eyes earnestly on Westcott's face; it was a handsome and sympathetic face. Why was his manner so mysterious and perplexing? But his appearance pleased her, and there was a genuine ring in his voice. She quickly decided; she put away all suspicion as ungenerous, and answered him. "I am listening. Pray do not hesitate to speak."

The young man gave Marian a grateful glance. "I have come to England," said he after a moment's pause, "on an affair which deeply concerns your father—an affair of the utmost importance. I have come to do what is in my power to save the old house of Girdlestone & Co., from ruin. Much that Mr. Carter told me had already reached my ears—through what medium, and how strange a one, you will hardly guess."

The weird stories that Marian had heard about this old house in Fisher's Folly—and of the quaint figure of Mr. Girdlestone, who had lived here so many years—were still fresh in her memory; even while a child, her mind had been busy puzzling out the meaning of these mysteries. But she was more puzzled now; and as these thoughts came rushing upon her—thoughts which Westcott's words had recalled—something of her strange mood seemed to enter into her expression while she played.

Westcott presently resumed. "You remember that Indian servant of Mr. Girdlestone's?" said he. "Well—I have seen him, and he has told me every secret he knew about my uncle."

Up In a Balloon.

A friend of mine was watching a balloon from the Naval exhibition passing over a London suburb the other day, and, seeing a number of handbills floating down, he carelessly picked one up, being struck with the heading, 'Telegram from the planet Mars.' 'Only an advertising dodge,' he said to himself, as he found it referred to somebody's special whiskey. Turning it over, however, he found a coupon on the back stating that on presentation of the same to the nearest agent he would be rewarded with a bottle of prime six-year-old Scotch whiskey. This actually proved correct, and probably while the exhibition lasts, there will be many on the look out for balloon missives, although I don't know how many coupons may be found among the thousands of handbills. Anyhow, it is one of the smartest advertising dodges of 'up-to-date' tradesmen.—Extract from the Kensington Express.

Messrs. Lawrence A. Wilson & Co. of Montreal, the Canadian agents for Messrs. Greenleess' Brothers celebrated "Claymore Scotch Whiskey state that this same balloon will make several ascensions during the exposition here and distribute thousands of telegrams during its flight over the city.

A VICTORY IN MANITOBA.

We favor our readers today with the following extracts, selected from a letter which we recently received from a gentleman in Winnipeg, Manitoba. He has travelled extensively over the whole province, knows the country well, and is therefore in a position to speak from experience. He has had ample opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the best druggists, who have not hesitated for a moment in giving their opinions when requested to do so. Our correspondent says:—"I have been over this province several times, and the more I see of it, the more do I recognize its immense possibilities. It must become the granary of this northern continent, and supply its inhabitants with food. Its people are hardy, thrifty, industrious and healthy, and the climate of the country is in every way conducive to good health and longevity. There is no country in the world of the same population which can show as good a health record. I find the people in the cities, towns and country districts have a holy horror of the hundreds of common patent medicines and preparations so extensively used in the east. I cannot say that in this favored agricultural land they are entirely exempt form ailments. Its men and women, like their eastern brothers and sisters, are often, owing to overwork of body and brain, rendered weak, nervous and irritable. I have met with such cases, and have had occasion to come in contact with the dyspeptic, and those whose digestive vigor had become sadly impaired, and others suffering from complicated liver and kidney troubles; but I invariably found that one great remedy was used, and had become exceedingly popular owing to its grand healing and renovating properties; I refer to Paine's Celery Compound. All other boasted preparations were eschewed and considered as useless. I became somewhat interested, and was curious to know why this should be, and asked the opinion of several druggists of high repute. By them I was told that such a feeling really existed throughout Manitoba, and that Paine's Celery Compound was indeed the great home remedy whenever a reliable medicine was wanted. These druggists spoke to me of most remarkable cures it had effected in their districts, and predicted for it a great future."

We may here inform our readers that Paine's Celery Compound today is quite as popular in the older provinces as it is in the Northwest, and continues to do its good work to the joy and satisfaction of all.

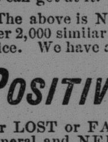
I FEEL BUOYANT


"Am happy to say that results so far are as satisfactory as I could expect, indeed much more so than I did expect. I am enjoying excellent health, appetite good, sleep sweet and refreshing, gaining flesh; am less nervous than I have been for years; feel bright and bouyant * * * It is almost miraculous, making a young man out of one of seventy, for that is just what your treatment is doing for me. I wish the community to know in as modest a way as we can get at it."
