ANNABEL

THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CHAPTER AMIL.

ANSABEL'S, WANDERNSCA, AND HOW THEY ENDED.

Uttering an irrepressible scream of terror, she flew forward at her utmost speed, Oh, if they should overtake her before she reached the village! She tried to measure the distance thither with her eye, and moaned aloud as she saw the length of road she had still to traveree. Faster and yet faster she urged her way, regardless of her blistered feet, which had swollen so within her shoes that the latter, soaked to pulp by the wet, were bursting asunder, and falling away in pieces from her ankles. Her senses being aroused to preternatural acuteness, the noise of the cart wheels grey fearfully distinct, till it filled all the aft, and it asqueed seif for pursuers were at her very kiels. This, efecures, only ineited her to still greater exertion; at the same time it caused her to glance back, when she saw that they were still a far distance in the rear, though near enough now for her to recognize them.

Dick was standing up lashing the galloping horse, and Moll was pointing her arm forward with violent gesticulation—proofs sufficient that she was observed by them, and that they understood the importance of overtaking her before she reached the village.

Annabel wasted scarcely a moment in her observation. She took in the terrible facts as if by intuition, but fixed her straining eyes in front where the village lay, nearer certainly to her than were those from whom she was flying, but too far to be gained in time without the most desperate effort.

Finding the shawl which was wrapped around her impeded her progress, she threw it off, leaving it lying on the road. This afforded sensible relief, and gave occelleration to her speed; but for minutes it looked as if she was making no progress, so far off still was the goal, yet, she migh! have been encouraged by noticing that the houses were begoning distantly for her will be doors were visible, and the shop windows of varied colours could be discerned.

By a fearful fascination she was again compelled to glance b men, as Englishmen and Christians, help me."

Before either of the two men could return an answer to this appeal the cart dashed into the square likewise, and Dick leaping to the ground, sprang to Annabel's side and grasped her by the arm, saying gruffly—

"So we have caught you at last, have we? And a pretty devil of a chase you have given us, too. Come along with you."

"No, no," cried Annabel wildly. "Oh, gentlemen, for mercy's sake do not let

"No, no," cried Annabel wildly. "Oh, gentlemen, for mercy is aske do not let him seize me."
"Why, what does all his mean?" asked the younger of the two men, who seemed to be the owner of the shop at the door of which the, stood.
"Hillon! you be Bick Mattecks?" said the older one.

"Milloa! you be like Mattecks?", said the older one.
"Yes, I'm Dick Mottocks, and this is my sister. Poor think, she's mad have been keeping her over at Dugden for some time, but she gave us the slip last night, and we have just found her.
"It is false, false," cried Annabel, vehemently. "I am not his sister. I am Annabel Leighton. His sister is dead, and they buried her for me. I have been the victim of a foul conspiracy."
"Hear how she raves, poor thing," said Dick, in a lone of affected pity. "That's her delusion. Her young mistress died in France, and the nursing of her turned her head."
"Oh, gentlemen, do not believe him; it is lies he is telling," exclaimed Annabel; "he has beep, hired by a woman to

"Oh, gentlemen, do not believe him; it is lies he is telling," exclaimed Annabel; 'he has been hired by a woman to keep me prisoner that she may have an estate which should be mine. I have been dreadfully wronged, but you—oh, you will save me."

By this time the inhabitants of the neighboring houses had been attracted to the street; and a small crowd had gathered, the people standing in gaping wonder, and cveryone regarding Annabel with strange and dubious books, half of pity, half of fear.

A number of Canadians who settled some years since in Missouri, have left that State and proceeded to Manitole, the theory report favorally some bundreds of Canadians from the same locality will cross over the line.
