Washington's Humanity and Humility. The great man, who moves so majestically, if with rather a stiff and ponderous tread, across the page of history, had a character of great humanity. It is told of him that on his way back from one of his Indian campaigns, he and one companion were making their way through the forest on foot, with a reacherous Indian guide. This guide suddenly turned and fired on them. "Are you hurt?" asked Washington of his companion. "No," he replied. They rushed on the Indian and captured him as he was reloading, and the companion wished to kill him. But Washington would not allow this. They sent him away, pretending to believe his statement that his gun had gone off by accident. Soon after his return he visited the gallery of the House of Burgesses in Virginia, when Mr. Robertson, who was the speaker, saw him, and said, "Gentlemen, it is proposed that the thanks of this house be given to Major Washington for the very gallant manner in which he has executed the important trust lately reposed in him by his excellency the governor." house rose as one man and faced him. Taken by surprise and overcome embarrassment, he in vain sought for words, but could only faintly articulate: "Mr. Speaker! Mr. Speaker!" until Mr. Robertson took pity on him and called out, "Sit down, Mr. Washington, your modesty is equal to your valor.'
