

The scope for some unilateral or multilateral restraint was seen as somewhat greater. Both the Soviet Union and United States seem to be interested in certain types of restraints (such as on the type of technology transferred, or on specific regional restraints). But the participation of second and third tier suppliers would be difficult to guarantee and, as the failed experience of the Carter Administration's restraint policy suggests, the road to control of the conventional arms trade is a long one.