York, on February 3, 1869. The play was "Romeo and Juliet" and the cast was headed by Edwin Booth, himself, while among the members of the supporting company were Mary McVicker, Edwin Adams (who was the sub-star of the occasion), and a host of famous players. Mr. Pitou headed the program as the Prince of Verona and so much in face and figure did he resemble Booth, that on his first entrance he received the tremendous ovation that was intended for the great tragedian. "The cheers and applause lasted for several minutes," said Mr. Pitou, in speaking of the event recently, "and

I was scared almost stiff. I glanced toward the wings and there stood Mr. Booth, quietly laughing at the mistake of the audience. 'Don't speak,' he cautioned. 'Wait until it is all over.' I waited and when the noise subsided, I spoke my first line, which gave the audience the clue to my identity. There was a flutter of programs and a quiet little laugh at the mistake. Then the performance went on and when Mr. Booth came out, he received a greater ovation, perhaps, than he would have received in the first instance. The version we played that night was that of William Winter, and the audience was not familiar with it, as that which had always been played before that time was the version of Colly Cibber.

THE CADETS, WHO MARCHED IN THE CHURCH PARADE, RECEIVED A GREAT OVATION ALL ALONG THE LINE.
