Rid of the Pests.

A Chester (Penn.) gentleman tells an interesting story in The Philadelphia Press of the manner in which a Delaware county farmer got rid of crows. He was greatly troubled by the depredations of these birds, and all means to drive them away permanently having failed, he tried an original plan. Taking a half peck or more of corn, he soaked it thoroughly in whisky and then scattered the cereal along the fence of the field chiefly visited by the feathered thieves. He soon had a number of crows eating the doctored corn, and as they didn't fly away he went to observe the effect of the dose. He found every crow gloriously drunk, some lying over on their sides, others tottering around in a mandlin attempt to fly. He could have killed every one of them, but the amusement created by the unsual scene made him resolve to await the outcome of the drunk. Gradually the birds recovered, and one by one flew unsteadily away. They seemed to realize that they were victimized, and during the remainer of the season that farmer was not troubled with any more depredations by crows.

"My dest," remarked Mr. Topnoody to his wife, after a little domestic jar, "a fool is not the worst thing in the world."

"Possibly not, Topnoody," she replied, shortly, my dest," more sinned against than sinning, and that he is in many respects a superior person, and—"

"Self-praise is half scandal, Topnoody," she interrupted, "and I wouldn't say any more if I was you.

A new baby sister came to Otto's house not long ago, and he was interested and delighted beyond measure at sight of her. That night he prayed earnestly for the welfare of the newcomer. His aunt, who was putting him to bed, reminded him that he had not asked the Lord's blessing on his mother.

"Oh, so I didn't," and down he went on his mees again. "And now, O Vord," he prayed, "bless mamma. Make her a dood mamma and make I mind mamma—but the baby's got to mind I."
