Smoking gives pleasure to three of our senses,
Without any great cost, or heavy expenses;
The palate is pleased with the sense of taste;
The nose, with the sense of smell;
The eyes, as clouds of smoke arise,
Are likewise pleased as well.

There is another sense might be added to the others,
For whenever smokers smoke together they feel like a band of brothers;
And when they smoke they like to drink a little "usquepae,"
For it lends a kindred pleasure to the moistening o' the clay.

And let me here remark,—

"Whoe'er found pleasure smoking in the dark?"

—Adam Ainslie
