Explosion at the Admiralty.

A few minutes before eleven o'clock on the morning of April 24, 1885, the Admiralty office in Whitehall, was the scene of an explosion caused by some apparatus placed in the room occupied by Mr. Swainson, Assistant Permanent Under Secretary of the Admiralty. He had come to the office as usual at a quarter past ten, entering the Whitehall quadrangle, and passing through the front entrance hall to his own room. Half an hour afterwards the sound of an explosion was heard, and from the shattered windows of the room at the back of the building, a volume of dust and smoke poured forth. A policeman and some of the officials hastened to Mr. Swainson's room, and found him lying in a corner, quite insensible, and bleeding from severe cuts on the head and hands, his hair and beard being singed and full of dust, fragments of plaster and splinters of wood and glass. The interior of the room was a complete wreck, the windows being blown out, a swing door communicating with a staircase wrenched off the ceiling torn, and great strips of the wall laid bare, while strong office furniture was dislodged from its place broken and damaged, but not altogether destroyed. Judging from the force of the explosion, it was wonderful that Mr. Swainson, who was sitting at the desk close to the bookcase where it is believed the exploding apparatus was fixed, should have escaped with his life. As it was he received a severe concussion of the brain and after regaining consciousness after some hours, could not remember what happened immediately before the explosion. It was thought that the explosive material was gunpowder, and ignited by a short time-fuse. Fragments of a galliot, and of a small iron pot were found among the rubbish in the room.

A Terrible Shipwreck.

A pitiful tragedy was the loss of the steamer "Anglo-Saxon" on April 27, 1883, at Chance Cove, when the sea took toll of 307 persons out of the 444 aboard. In those days, there was no Atlantic cable, but the telegraph lines extended from the American continent to Cape Race. That headland was a stopping place for the fast ocean liners plying between Liverpool and New York to exchange with a news boat maintained at the station, the latest news of the two hemispheres. The American Civil War was then raging, and there was keen rivalry among the liners to deliver the despatches first. While steaming through a fog at full speed, the "Anglo-Saxon" impaled herself on the rocks. She ran straight into a gulch, and the furious waves soon beat her to splinters. The coast folk gathered at her distress signals. A rampart cliff, a sheer 500 feet above the sea level, defied all hope of assistance by ordinary means. The handmen had to bring spars and ropes from their boats, improvise derricks, and lower one another down into the boiling surf, where, as a body floated by, the rescuer clutched it and was hoisted up with his burden, living or dead. When the ship struck, the prow was wedged in the rocks, and a score or two of survivors lashed themselves there. But the rescuers could not reach them, and the castaways had to jump overboard and take chances of being saved as the waves flung them to and fro. The fisher continued their humane endeavors until all hope of their being a human soul on the wreck or rocks was abandoned. The fisherfolk cared for the survivors, and rescuers, when the storm abated, recovered as many other bodies as they could, and buried them all in a plot on the hill top. In 1900 the United States Government arranged for the removing of the burial place, the earth having been washed away by heavy rains.

MARINER LOSES BANK ROLL.

Capt. Pye arrived here Saturday morning from Boston, Mass., and was to have taken the steamer Kyle Saturday night for Newfoundland. He didn't make the latter voyage, according to the North Sydney Herald of April 17, simply because, as he says, he got "too full." Pye told the police he had some liquor on his person which he brought with him on the journey from the hub. He met some parties near the head of the terminus wharf whom he treated. He says he went to the Stamper house where he secured lodgings. He was given a key with which to lock his bedroom door, but he failed in this, either because he thought there was no need or forgot to do so. At any rate he told the police that a little bag he had secured around his neck by a cord and which he wore inside his shirt, had been tampered with some time during the night, and his wad of $100 confiscated. He says he also lost some money out of his pockets. But he has no recollection of anybody being in his room. That is the story he told the police and the latter are hunting up clues in the hope of ascertaining who took the mariner's money.

Popular Baritone

Warmly Received.

WELL-BALANCED SHOW AT THE NICKEL.

Henry G. Kelly's rich baritone voice was heard to advantage last night as he rendered two splendid selections that appeared to have been composed expressly for him. The effect he put in his numbers was readily appreciated by the audience who responded by their loud applause. The outstanding feature of "Roads of Destiny" is the opportunity it gives Pauline Frederick to do some dramatically effective acting. The production is excellent and the star is ably supported by John Dowers, Jane Novak and the other members of the cast. Founded on the stage play made by Channing Pollock for C. C. Henry's story, the screen version closely follows the book. The story is in four episodes, and each episode has its thrill and pathos, each episode ending with a startling climax. "Roads of Destiny" is a strong drama from every viewpoint, and is such as will satisfy everybody who likes something out of the common.

BETTY DONN GOES OVER

The large audiences that the Crescent Theatre were enthusiastic in their praise of the tiful singing of Miss Betty Donn, popular lyric-soprano. Her were faultlessly rendered and the hearty reception of the picture part of the program was equally as good, being Waldo's massive screen titled "The Oath," taken from Ham J. Locke's great novel. The story has an unusually appal, which is well handled by a notable cast of screen celebrities including Miriam Cooper, T. Earle and the beautiful Nilsson. The sets are all and the English atmosphere rounding the story has a unique effect. To miss "The Oath" miss one of the most photoplay attractions shown here. To-night is the last change this picture.

DRESS
Do you have a dress budget? Do you know just how much money you can afford for clothes and do you sit down and plan in advance just how much to spend?

Not a woman who will answer these questions. And there can be one woman in who will tell that that is absolutely the way to get the full value out of money and to minimize clothes as far as possible.

Suppose there is a woman who will answer these questions. Not a woman who will answer these questions. No, but a woman who will answer these questions. No, but a woman who will answer these questions.
