It must, however, be recognized that no small proportion of a congregation can read music, and would more heartily in the singing if they had the music before them.

In order to have hearty congregational singing, much depends on the organist. If he or she has a temperament that will permit of the proper interpretation of the music, and sufficient executive ability to be able to play in a correct and rhythmic manner, the congregation cannot help singing well, even without a musical director or a quartet, though the advantage of having a good quartet and choir is not to be despised.
