Carter Troop, now an established favorite with Bridgetown audiences, displayed his usual PUBLIC MEETING, which he views things, pertaining to the country's general interests, is microscopically narrow, and his knowledge of governmental duties and responsibilities are exceedingly meagre. He has, we admit, more common sense than erudition—more patriotism than information—and more zeal than to benefit the public than ability to do so. His language is coarse, his style eluming, and his sentences wiretchedly ungargmantical. He lacks the necessary mental training and thorough acquain:
