stay the summer out, by getting accompanies of the other powers, and we may be of our own good faith and perfect honesty at this crisis. Europe judges us more by the past than by the present, and regards every step we take in the Levant with an unfounded but not unnatural idstrust, it knows that Egypt is of essential importance to us, and it can hardly be lieve that our hesitation to adagnate our interest of the feelings of other states. Here is, perhaps, the secret of our exclusively maval demonstration at Alexandria. Had we, when the fleet was originally desystacked, sent an army corps with it—as from a purely military point of view, should have been energed. France exclude, and Europe uneasy. An enterprise of "great pith and moment," when the European Powers, now face to face with plain facts, will understand the European Powers, now face to face with plain facts, will understand that the European Powers, now face to face with plain facts, will understand that the European Powers, now face to face with plain facts, will understand that the European Powers, now face to face of the country. The affer to the Porte of the task of restoring order in Egypt may be useful as a kind of homage to international law. But though the Sultan was six months ago the sovereign who ought to have been pressed to put down Arabi by calling him to Constantinople, it is obvious that now he is by no means the best "policeman of Europe." There was a time when Arabi was merely an insolent colonel of local mutineers unknown throughout the East; and the word of the Sultan or a very slight exercise to Turkish force would have suppressed him, amid the applause of all musulmans, who would have regarded with horror the idea of resistance to the Caliph. Now, through delay and intigue, however, Arabi has been enablied to get alternately roasted by the heat, and entirely now the solution of the Sultan or a very slight exercise to Turkish force would have suppressed him, amid the applause of all musulmans, who would have regarded with horror the idea of resistance to the Caliph. Now, through delay and intigue, however, Arabi has been enablied to death by east winds and entirgue, however, Arabi has been enablis of the Sultan or a very slight exercise to Turkish force would have regarded with horror the idea of resistance to the Caliph. Now, through delay a of mutineers, that we can entirely trust the policy of the Porte? For the record of events show that the Sultan, even if honest, has been weak enough to condone treason and reward rebellion, while it is only too probable that, when it affected to rebuke Arabi, the Porte or the palace secretly instigated him to dispute the authority of the Katedive. The whole history of the East is a story of successful treacheries, unexpected mutinies and arranged surrenders. In these very waters Me hemat Ali negotiated a naval treason, one of the most remarkable in history, when he bought the Ottoma fleet, Captain, Pasha and all. It is certainly not beyond probability that the Turk is General and all his men might pass over in a body to the enemy, or reduce to fire on Arabi, as distinctly as the French soldiers in the course of his address the proper when he landed from Elba. Then Europe would be confronted with an aggravated situation, and we should at heavy cost and with great difficulty, have to rescue the land from the second plague of a renewed nutiny. Mean while the patient is dying, and the doctors delay to decide who shall perform the sultant s the danger of the task increase. We might have protected Alexandria; now we gard its ruins, and soon Cairo may share its fate at the hands of an infurated mob. Much of the evil has been due to the miserable policy of France, too nervous under M. de Freycinet to act with courage herself, too exclusive to allow an early appeal to Europe, too joalous to permit England to act with the necessary promptitude. It was she also that precluded Turkish intervention until it was too late to be of uses The best thing to be hoped for now is that Turkey will decline the mission about to be forward to about to he forward condition of freight rates at the present time.
