

erance, have faced persecutions, seduction and abandon, you have kept everywhere, not only the tradition but also the religion, customs, language and love of your country. Has not the time arrived to depart from that selfish indifference with which we rewarded their affection? Those to whom the greatness and prospects of France are yet worthy of consideration will understand that to call attention on the national question is to mind the future eventually laid up for the French race.
