T. LAWSON OF SASKATOON

Western Man Hurried Hom From World Tour to Enlist—His Officers Were His Former Employes

In the latest list of casualties in the 10th Battalion appears the name of Pte. T. Lawson, his next of kin being his brothers in Saskatoon. Behind the bald announcement of his death is a story of which Canadians may well be proud, for Pte. T. Lawson was a western millionaire who cut short a globe-girdling tour to join the colors. The company of which he was a member was commanded at the time of his death by a young man who in time of peace was an employe of Pte. Lawson. His sergeant, too, was on his payroll. We have no details of the engagement that cost the life of Pte. Lawson and many other brave fellows, but those who knew him in civilian life knew that he would be a happy warrior; that he valued his own life not at all, and that, though he was in the very morning of a career that might well have been an honorable and distinguished one, he would have chosen no

Unsightly Pimples Covered His Face.

All diseases and blemishes of the skin are caused by the blood being in an impure condition.

You cannot make a good complexion from the outside; you must get to the root of the trouble. You must make the blood pure and rich by taking a medicine that will drive out all the impurities and poisons from the blood; one that drives out everything from the system that is the cause of these unsightly skin eruptions.

The best blood cleansing medicine on the market to-day is Burdock Blood Bitters; a medicine that has been used with the greatest success for the past forty years; a medicine you don't experiment with when you buy it. Mr. Lennox D. Cooke, Indian Path, N.S., writes: "I am writing you a few lines to tell you what Burdock Blood Bitters has done for me. Last winter my face was covered with pimples. I tried different kinds of medicine, and all seemed to fail. I was one day to a friend's house, and there they advised me to use B.B.B., so I purchased two bottles, and before I had them taken I found I was getting better. I got two more, and when they were finished I was completely cured. I find it is a great blood purifier, and I recommend it to all." B.B.B. is manufactured only by The T. Millburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

was the son of Rev. O. T. Lawson, an Irish Methodist minister, who went west with his family in the early pioneering days. The boys were accustomed to the rifle and the saddle almost from their infancy, and became locally noted for their skill. Talmaage was a cowboy, and for many miles there was not his equal at throwing and branding a steer, breaking a pony, supplying the day's meal with gun and taking care of himself in any of the sudden crises that the pioneers had to face in unsettled countries. Particularly was he famed for his gentleness with the dumb brutes in his care. It was said that he could ride a horse faster and have him fresher the next morning than any plainsman in the west. In the course of time he saved up enough money to buy a ranch near Calgary. He prospered there, and when a favorable opportunity offered sold his property and bought more in the neighborhood of what is now Saskatoon.

The Saskatoon Millionaire. He added to his possessions in this district, but it is doubtful if he had any idea that Saskatoon was to become one of the most thriving cities in the west. One morning he awoke to find that he owned a ranch upon the outskirts of a growing city, and that he had been made wealthy by the determination of thousands of people to own building lots in his immediate neighborhood. Another brother was the owner of an adjoining section, and prosperously began to flow in upon the family. Talmaage became interested in newspaper enterprises, and helped to found the Prince Albert Herald, and later on bought the Saskatoon Capital, whose name was immediately changed to the Saskatoon Star, which is said by Mr. Knowles to be the most outstanding example of newspaper success in Saskatchewan.

BELGIANS AID BY STRIKING

Men Refuse To Work For The Germans

Pay Dearly For Patriotism—Invaders Hampered by Stubborn Resistance to Violations of Hague Convention

After the million German crimes in Belgium, crowned by the murder of Miss Cavell, it is almost an anti-climax to receive the eighteenth report of the commission of enquiry which has been investigating Germany's violations of the rules of civilized warfare, and which has been forwarded by the Coma-Gen-eral for Belgium in Canada. There is nothing here for tears, and yet we gain from the report an idea of the steady heroism of the hundreds of thousands of Belgian workmen who remained at home after the German invasion and have since come under the authority of the Germans. We are told how in the face of the German bayonets and the bayonets they have steadily refused to work for their taskmasters. They have ignored wages wages that would give them in one day more than they have earned in any week, and knowing that they were at the mercy of their conquerors they have persisted in their refusal to do any work that might be in the interest of Germany.

Convention which Germany subscribed to forbid an occupying force to exact from the districts of an occupied country forced labor which obliges those who perform it to take part in an act of war against their own country. That is to say if the Germans occupied Toronto, they could not oblige Toronto motomen to run cars carrying German troops to a point where they could engage the Canadian army. At the Hague Convention Germany agreed to this; and it is to be observed that at this convention Germany was not the polite second of every proposal put forward. She advanced ideas of her own, and other ideas she dissented from. That she should not observe the rules to which she objected at the time is not to be wondered at; but this particular rule she approved. In Belgium she has persistently violated it. She has sought by every means in her power to force railway employes to return to their throbbles and move German armies to and fro across the country. Owing to their refusal, it is said that several accidents have occurred, the German engine drivers being unaccustomed to the steep grades upon some of the Belgian roads.

Harried Home to Enlist. Mr. Lawson did not, apparently, enter the newspaper business with the idea of making a fortune, but rather for the purpose of stimulating the growth of the west. He was delighted with the fact that he had made all the money he could ever spend, but said that what pleased him most was the thought that he would be able to help the fellows who needed it. His one unfulfilled ambition was to travel, and some eighteen months ago he set forth on a tour around the world. He was in Egypt when the European war cloud began to form, and by the time he was in London, he was hurrying to London. His first thought was to enlist there, but he heard that Canada was to participate in the great struggle, and he lost no time in getting home. He was too late to join the first Canadian force, but enlisted as soon as possible, and last January was moved to Winnipeg with Saskatchewan volunteers.

Mr. Knowles says that in conversation with Pte. Talmaage in the Star office, the young millionaire appeared to have thought of nothing but the fact that the Empire was in danger, and that he should get to the front. It was as if he had thought that it occurred to him that he ought to make a will and go to the bank and arrange his affairs. When he left Saskatoon he would not allow his newspaper to make any reference to his departure. He was displeased when the other papers made a feature of the fact that he was going as a private instead of as a commissioned officer, although he was a born leader. When he got to the front he found that his platoon was commanded by Lieut. Austin B. Smith, one of his reporters, and that one of his linotype operators was Joe B. Shaw, his sergeant. So Pte. Lawson served under the men who were drawing their wages from him, and took their orders as cheerfully and obeyed as faithfully as would any other private soldier. Mr. Knowles says that his death removes one real man and gentleman from the ranks of Canadian journalism.

In Love and War. We have an old vicious saying to the effect that all is fair in love and in war, and nothing more foreign to the genius of British people was ever made into a proverb. Pro-Germans, however, quote the saw in order to justify Germany in the many inhuman practices she has adopted. They say that if explosive bullets will more surely lead an army to victory the army ought to adopt them, since the end in view is death to the enemy, and a man can die but once, no matter what sort of bullet is employed. It is to be admitted that some of the conventions of warfare amount to no more than a discussion whether a man should be killed by the point rather than by the edge of a sword. They do not attempt to defend, however, the practice of a nation agreeing with other nations to abide by certain rules which it had an equal voice in framing and then at the first necessity, departing from these rules. Those who say that all is fair in love and war would not dare to argue that dishonor and treachery are fair.
