quite as important as any for The Eclipse."

"I thought that nothing was so important to a newspaper man as his paper," said the other.

"There are not many things that can enter into the competition," said Trent, smiling frankly into his friend's eyes; "but this is exceptional. I have come home to be married."

Dr. Clarke expressed his astonishment in a long-drawn whistle.

"You are a young man of many surprises, Trent," he said. "What will you do with a wife, in all the half-civilized and out of-the-way corners of the world that you have such a predilection for?"

"Perhaps I shall reform my wandering tendencies," said Trent, "The Eclipse has given me an easy task for the winter—to do their California correspondence. So I am to be married to morrow to May Derring and start at once for the coast."

the winter—to do their California correspondence. So I am to be married to morrow to May Derring and start at once for the coast."

As the young man talked, the physician was watching him more closely than he had at first been doing. When Trent entered the office he had been apparently bubbling with vitality. The keen air had given his cheeks a ruddy color that had for a moment misled even the physician's practiced eye. But now he noted a certain listlessness of manner, a suggestion of gauntness of visage: the glow had gone from his face, and in its stead had come a pallor that was hardly in keeping for a man who was talking about being married on the morrow, and starting on a transconti-

"That is not all you came to tell me?"

"No," replied Trent, hesitatingly, "I came to consult you as a physician and friend. I thought I would like to fix things so that May would be comfortable if anything should happen to me."

"You are not thinking of marrying and dying, all at once, asked the physician, abruptly.

"No, of course not. But in my work a man may get bowled over without much warning."

"And so you want some life insurance was a sport sold roller out unharmed, the centre of a bundle of the court of the co much warning."
"And so you want some life insurance

"Yes." assented Trent, relieved to be thus helped to his conclusion."

"And you had never thought," said the physician, "that a man has some duties toward himself."

He came toward the young man as he spoke, and laid his ear down upon his chest. Then he listened for a moment.

"Splendidly equipped by nature for the battle of life, you have abused every gift that she gave you. You have done the work of ten men. You have done the work of ten men. You have despised fatigue. You have laughed at danger, and have scorned disease. You have followed armies, and have been the first to tell the world of their slaughter—and your paper and not yourself has had the glory. You have penetrated the secrets of courts and of camps. These things are worth the camps. These things are worth the doing. I grant you," he said, as the young man's eye kindled and his cheek flushed, "if you do not pay too great a financd, "It you do not pay too great a price."

"I have not paid too much," said Trent, eagerly. "Perhaps I am a little below par just now; but the trip to the coast and the winter there, with May to look after me, will set me all right again. And next year The Eclipse—"
But the physician interrupted him, although he turned away and busied himself in another part of the room as he answered; The killing of any bison, buffalo, quail or Chinese pheasant is forbidden by law in Montana for ten years, and the killing of any mose, elk, otter or beaver for six years after March 1, 1893.

self in another part of the room as he answered;

"Miss Derring will not go with you, and the insurance is out of the question You will not take the risk of leaving her unprovided for, nor, if you are the man I think, you will take the risk of having children born to you and to her with an inheritance of disease."

As he finished he turned toward Trent again, and a gleam of tenderness from his deep eyes tempered the brusqueness of his words.

his deep eyes tempered the brusqueness of his words.

Frent gripped the arms of his chair with the nervous tension of a man bracing himself for a physical shock.

"You may be frank with me, sir," he said steadily. "I am not a coward."

"I know. If you were, I should not care so much, You will not marry Miss Derring. You may try California if you wish, but it will not much matter,"

"How long a lease have I?"

"If you are careful, a year. If you are imprudent or should exert yourself violently—" He made an expressive gesture in conclusion.

Trent looked out from the low window thoughtfully.

dow thoughtfully. "To morrow was to have been my wedding day," he said quietly. "I would have liked to finish my course; but it does not much matter."
"My dear boy," said the physician, laying his hand gently upon the other's shoulder, "our course is finished when God says the word,"

Trent was deadly pale as he went out upon the street, but it was not the pallor of fear.

He was buried in thought, yet keenly conscious of every physical aspect of nature. For months he had been breathing the heavy, moisture-laden air of the tropics. This northern air, clear, dry and cold, had a sweet taste in his mouth. He liked the white glitter of the snow, and thought it made the world seem pure and clean. The world had never seemed fairer, and the morrow was his wedding day.

He laughed gently and mirthlessly at this. Of course, the world seemed fair were to morrow. Trent had faced death many times, but never like this. He had fought a duel once, and the memory of it came to him now, startlingly vivid.

The quarrel had been forced upon him; they fought with pistols; his opponent was a dead shot. Trent remembered how long the time was that they stood there facing each other, before the handkerchief fell. How clearly he could see it all: The bit of green sward fringed by the heavy woods. The surgion at one side, kneeling, busy with his instruments. The seconds, eager, alert, one of them holding the handkerchief which he was to drop as the signal for firing. And his opponent in his white shirt, clean and crisp as the snow there, making such an excellent mark. making such an excellent mark.

But Trent did not intend to fire. He would let his opponent shoot, if he would, but as for himself, he had no taste for that sort of thing. But—how slow that man with the handkerchief was! This suspense was worse than the sting of a dozen bullets—worse than death itself.

It was the brightest, cheeriest winter morning that could be imagined. The ground was well covered with clean snow, that sparkled radiantly in the sunshine. It was sharply cold, and a crust had formed upon the pavements that crackled and snapped musically beneath the firm impact of John Trent's boot heels.

Trent's head was erect, his eyes bright and the wine of life and the joy of living tingled through his being to his very finger tips, He walked quickly, as a man intent upon some definite purpose, yet took time to look about him and to enjoy the fair prospect. Half way down the street he stopped before an unpretentious office, looked at the door plate to make sure that he was right, and then sprang lightly up the steps.

Entering the office he was greeted cordially by a man more than twice his own age, whose dignified and courtly appearance betokened a gentleman of the old school, and whose surroundings proclaimed him a physician.

"John Trent!" he exclaimed, with evident surprise. "I am glad to see you, although you are the last man that I expected this morning. I thought you were in Nicaragua for The Eclipse, studying the science of revolutions."

"And so I was, ten days ago," responded Trent, "but matters have grown rather dull down there, and—" he hesitated, laughing gently—"the fact is that I had an engagement here to fill, avite as important as any for The color had said that he must die. It would take six months or, maybe, a

The doctor had said that he must die. It would take six months or, maybe, a year. That was the worst of it. For he remembered how that fellow had been ages just dropping the handkerchief.

He knew just what he would do. When the horses were a little nearer he would run forward, seize the bits of the near horse and throw all his weight.

"And so you want some life insurance as a provision against such a contingency?"
