very neat, and one could tell at a glance the variety.

To us on this side of the Atlantic, who grow apples by the hundreds or thousands of barrels, this method of storing fruit seems like child's play, but if we were to receive nineteen cents each for such fruits, perhaps we might think differently. But—and now comes a spraying moral—the gardener said that the spotted ones only sold for two or four cents each. As we had seen such highly-priced apples in Paris, we were not surprised at this information.

There was a group of the fruit of a cactus which gave a dash of bright color to the collection, but our general impression was that there was the usual European lack of high color.

The next room seemed to be a fruit specimen room. The arrangement of shelves was similar to the previous room, only a gummed label was attached to one fruit in each group. There were several English varieties, and prominent among them sat the Emperor Alexander apple.

At the fruit rooms our interview with the gardener terminated, and another individual piloted us down and round the corners of corridors where we had a glimpse of the class-rooms and cases of insects. At the end of the corridor our escort bowed farewell, and we were passed over to a clerk who bade us sit down in a large, square room. I sat and wondered how many more guides it would require before we arrived at headquarters. However, after an interval, we were ushered through another door into the presence of Monsieur N., who had our letter of introduction on his desk. John explained to him in French (for so far no one understood a word of English) that we were walking through France for pleasure, and were interested in fruit culture, and so on. At this information Monsieur rang the bell for his clerk, and directed him to write a list of tours which we might make in the Valley of the Loire, and around Orleans, Blois, and other places.

After much courtesy from the staff we departed, carrying the paper headed: "Republique Francaise, Ministere de L'Agriculture, etc." We paused in the courtyard and gazed at a flowering pansy bed surrounding a monument. I forgot the name of the celebrity standing on the pedestal, but that is not to be wondered at, as we saw so many statues in the palace gardens the day before that there seemed enough to make a stone regiment.

At the conciergerie we strapped on our haversacks while the woman there talked pleasantly to us. Just here I might explain that the conciergerie is the janitor or porter of a large French house. He has a room called the conciergerie near the front door (which savors of drawbridge times). It is this man's duty to admit visitors and receive messages.

As we stepped out into the street the conciergerie directed us towards Orleans, which we did not reach till nine days later.

EUNICE BUCHANAN.

"An Old Farmer."

A writer to the New York Tribune, who signs himself as above, has a word to say about the horse and his treatment that is so full of good sense that we want our readers to have the benefit of it. The gist of it is that the horse gives back to his owner in actual value generous returns for proper care and kind treatment. He tells of two horses he owned which worked for twenty years and never lost a day from sickness, but, he says, "Not a forkful of musty hay nor a measure of musty oats or an ear of mouldy corn ever went to their feeding; they were properly watered and groomed, and not hurried or harried."

Here is the secret. Hurrying, fretting, jerking at the bit, loud talking, rough, impatient treatment—these things undo even the benefits of the best feeding. How quickly you discover the comfortable look in a horse's face—if he has it! Wherever you find it you will find his coat sleek, his temper good, and capacity for service up to the limit of his strength. The article closes with a statement with which we heartily agree: Kindness pays in the care of all animals. I do not believe there ever was a domestic animal which was treated kindly from its birth that became vicious.—F. H. R., in "Our Dumb Animals."

The Spice of Life.

The archbishop had preached a fine sermon on married life and its beauties. Two old Irish women were heard coming out of church commenting on the address.

"'Tis a fine sermon his Riverence would be after giving us," said one to the other.

"It is, indade," was the quick reply, "and I wish I knew as little about the matter as he does."

A WAYWARD TONGUE.

The chairman of the committee was addressing a meeting at a teachers' institute:

"My friends, the schoolwork is the bul-house of civilization, I mean—ah—"

He began to feel frightened.

"The bulhouse is the schoolwork of civ—"

A smile could be felt.

"The workhouse is the bulschool of—"

He was evidently twisted.

"The schoolbul is the housework—"

An audible snigger spread over the audience.

"The bulschool—"

He was getting wild. So were his hearers. He mopped his perspiration, gritted his teeth, and made a fresh start.

"The schoolhouse, my friends—"

A sigh of relief went up. Hamlet was himself again!

He gazed serenely around. The light of triumphant self-confidence was enthroned upon his brow.

"Is the woolbark—"

And that is when he lost consciousness.—Answers.

HARSH MEASURES.

The wounded Highlander in hospital was very depressed, and seemed to make no headway toward recovery. He was for ever talking about his "bonnie Scotland," and the idea occurred to the doctor that a Scotch piper might rouse his spirits.

After some hunting around a piper was found, and it was arranged that he should present himself outside the hospital that night, and pour forth all the gems of Scottish music the pipes were capable of interpreting. This he did.

When the astute doctor turned up the next morning he eagerly asked the matron:

"Did the piper turn up?"

"He did," replied the matron.

"And how's our Scotch patient?"

"Oh, he's fine; I never saw such a change," said the matron.

"That's grand. It was a fine idea of mine to get that piper," said the delighted doctor.

"Yes," said the matron, sadly; "but the other thirty patients have all had a serious relapse."—Tit-Bits.
