

HOPE ON.

Hope on, tired heart, hope on!
Though dark thy lot,
Nor one bright spot
To cheer thy lonely way.

The Foster Brother.

The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ORPHAN'S RECEPTION—THE FUNERAL.

It was a beautiful October afternoon on which the funeral took place.
The sun had been buried a few hours before, and most of the fishermen and the men of the near neighbourhood, having carried them to their last resting place, remained to form the funeral procession.

The place of graves to which the funeral procession was leading was a desolate and lonely churchyard, situated on a lofty eminence near the town of Ardrossan—a town which in those days was small compared with what it is now.

And as it was, a man came nearest the coffin, that Kenneth had found the unknown. It was grave to be dug, and his dark hair gleamed in the slanting rays of sunlight streaming through the foliage of the trees, a richly variegated with their autumnal hues.

The funeral and all connected with it had touched Kenneth deeply, but most touching to him of all was the sight presented on his return home, when he entered the lighted parlour and saw George and Carey parading together on the hearth, in all the exuberance of laughter and glee.

"The shadows of infancy and the griefs of childhood are like the morning cloud and early dew which quickly vanish away."
So Kenneth thought to himself, and though his heart was sad, sad, when he looked on the laughing child and thought of the lonely grave upon the hill, yet in its deepest consciousness he felt how dear it was that it should be so.
