CHAPTER XXII.
A FOUL DEED—THE MISSING ONE.
"No need to his again," muttered the ruffian. "The first has finished him."
Just then another muffled form came from behind the bushes which grew on the edge of the ravine, and stole cautiously forward.
"Is he—dead?" gasped the new comer, in a hoarse whisper.
"I take it so," responded the other, stooping down and moving George by one of his arms.
He turned him half over, till the white, still face could be seen by the dim light of the stars, and the closed eyes, the terrible paleness, and the settled features seemed to proclaim that life had fled.
"Ay, ay, he is dead enough," said the man, in rather a louder tone. "The blow must have fallen on a vital spot."
He quitted his hold of the body, stood straight up, and the two gazed at each other for some moments in silence.
Despite the darkness, and the mufflings which had been adopted for concealment, their features could easily be discerned by a close view, and they were the features of Stephen Gibson and Nathan Garrett.
It was Garrett who had struck the foul blow, and proclaimed its result to his companion, who was in intention as guilty of the deed as himself.
Determined and prepared as they had been to commit the murder, its accomplishment had a powerful effect on them, and for nearly a minute they stood looking at each other with eyes that revealed an irrepressible inward terror.
"What are we to do with him?" asked Stephen at length, and the tones in which he spoke had a hollow huskiness which startled himself.
"We must bear him to the shaft of the mine and drop him in," returned Garrett.
"How fortunate that he came in this direction; it saves us the trouble of carrying him far."
"Then, for God sake, let us be quick about it," said Stephen. "If we should be seen now we are lost."
"See! Who is to see us here, and at this hour? No one but a poacher would think of rambling to this place, and, thanks to me, poachers have not been in the Ardgowan woods for years."
"Still, let us be quick and get the work finished," rejoined Stephen. "I shall not feel safe till the body is disposed of."
"Come then, help me to bear it along. We must lift it clear of the ground so as to show no mark or trail."
Between them they lifted the inanimate though still warm form from the grass, and bore it over the rough uneven ground which lay between the path and the ravine. The distance they had to go was not great, but the burden was heavy, and this and the unequal surface over which they bore it—consisting of large stones and abrupt little hillocks, overgrown with rank grass which the frost of the winter could not wholly wither away—caused them to stagger and stumble, and become breathless with their efforts.
At last they reached an open space very near the edge of the slope, where in the centre of a mound of stones and earth was a circular wooden enclosure, the bars of which were hunched together. To this point they bore the body, and had almost reached it when, to their consternation, George returned to consciousness, and, grasping Garrett by the arm, gazed at him and at Stephen Gibson in a wild bewildered manner.
This brought them to a sudden though momentary stand, and in their utter discomfiture they had no presence of mind to conceal their faces. George recognised them, and the recognition brought a sudden conviction of their fearful purpose.
"Oh, heaven, you would not murder me," he exclaimed, striving to free himself from their hold.
With an oath, Garrett clutched him more firmly, and, calling on Stephen to do the same, they dragged him up the mound which encircled the wooden enclosure.

Mr. ISAAC SHANTZ, Bridgeport, has been elected Deputy Reeve of Waterloo Township in place of Mr. Isaac Burkholder, deceased.
Mr. J. DUGANNO, of West Garafraxa, turned up an Indian pipe while ploughing on his farm one day recently. The pipe has been made of a light colored stone, was well shaped and highly polished.
The Rajah of Kolapore's cup, won by the Canadian Team at Wembleton, and the magnificently ornamented gold cup presented by the merchants of Old London "as an offering of good fellowship" to the Canadian Volunteers, have arrived at Ottawa.
