"He is a printer, and owns a newspaper in a country town. He is about to celebrate his 25th jubilee and his silver wedding on the same day, and so I thought to myself that it would be wonderfully fine to send him a poem, a really beautiful one, one that may be printed in his paper. That would have pleased him so very much."

"How old is he?"

"Nearly 50. I myself am in the seventies. I married young and became a widow young."

"What was your husband?"
"What was your husband?"
"A teacher of languages, and such a gentleman when he was sober—which was very seldom in the last years. When the boy was 12 years old, my husband died, and I fought my way along by means of needle-work and working out, like all widows, till my son grew large and was in a situation where he could gain a good living."

"Then he assisted you?"

"Then he assisted you?"

"No, then he got married; and you know when a man has a family to care for—"

"He lets his old mother take care of herself."

"I need but little. I have a free room now in the charity-house, and am, God be thanked, so well that I can sew and knit for strangers. So, with a little economy, I get along well enough. My son would gladly help me, but you see, the wife—she had money, and so he cannot do what he would like to."

"Shall..."

"Shall we not speak of the poem?"
"Oh, yes. I wished that he should not before her, and regarded it with admiring looks.

"Is it not magnificent?"

"It surely is," replied the young man, with a kindly look of approval. "It must have cost mush?"

"It was not cheap," proudly responded the old woman. "I had to save a long time before I could buy it."

"I can well believe that."

"You are so good and benevolent that I dare to tell you how I did it."

"Do, then."

"You see we poor little folks live mostly on bread and coftee all day, and it occurred to me that many people take their coffee without sugar or milk. One can do without either; is it not so?"

"In the South coffee is always drunk black," said he with a serious look.

"You see that I was right."

"And you did the same?"

"For more than a year; and in that way I saved so much that I could buy this beautiful present, and still have the five crowns left for a poem," she said triumphantly.

The young man had hastily seated himself at the writing table and pushed aside his manuscripts. Tear-drops fell on some pages.

"She was buried to-day," said he briefly.
"And I, chattering old woman, come here and disturb you, instead of leaving you alone with your grief to weep in peace. God console and strengthen you! I will go now."

"Wait a little, I will write the poem for you."

"But it must be ready this evening, and besides—besides—I am so poor."

"You did not let me finish before, I intended to say, "I either take 50 crowns for a poem, or give it for nothing."

"But I cannot expect that you—we are quite strangers to each other."

"On, no, we have become acquainted, Please be seated, and tell me something of your son. Now, then. First—what is he?"
