The quality of export and butchers cattle was much better than usual. A few bunches of exceptionally choice were offered the butcher line. The run was pretty well cleaned out of the pens at the close, save a few bunches of poor stock, which were unsalable. Export cattle-The movement in this line was much brisker than on Friday last, the bulk the offerings being picked up before noon; the quotations underwent no quotable change, and choice selections 'ewre quoted at $4 80 to $5 101/2 per cwt. A light run of light exporters brought $4 50 to $4 75 per cwt. DESERTED, PAYING NO PENALTY

Exceptional Experience of a Soldier

at One of the Western Stations. "I once had a talk not long ago with a fine specimen of an American soldier, who, although he once deserted from the army, is still wearing the stripes and chevrons of a sergeant," said a regular army officer, who got his commission from the ranks. "He's on furlough in New York. Call him Kelley. When I was on recruiting duty at David's Island—now Fort Slocum-as a sergeant, a good many years ago, this Kelley came to my company as a rookie. He was every inch a soldier. I knew that he had been a soldier. So did all the old-timers who had sized Kelley up. It made me feel foolish when I took Kelley out with a lot of recruits for an awkward squad drill. He tried with all the skill he had to act like a man who had never seen a gun in his life, but I felt all the time that Kelley was just laughing at me. One day in the middle of the manual drill 1 gave a somewhat unusual command-a command that recruits wouldn't be pected to know anything about—just for the sake of trying out Kelley. Well, after a couple of months at David's Island I got my orders. I was to join an infantry regiment at Fort Assiniboine, Montana, and take charge of a large batch of recruits assigned to the same outfit. The whole bunch got their orders simultaneously with me. Among the batch was Kelley. ran into him at the canteen about half an hour after we got our orders. "'Say,' said Kelley, 'I don't know whether to duck or not."
"'For why?' I asked him.

"There's a captain out there in Assiniboine that knows me.' said Kelley. I was in his outfit when I got into the rummy mess that caused me to jump before. And I was a sergeant at He's a pretty square old geezer, and I soldiered up to the handle as long as I was with him, but, all the same, I'm afraid he'll land me if I go out

I knew that he had recognized Kelley. VALUE OF GOOD BEDS

Anarchy and Nervous Disorders Traced to Loss of Proper Rest.

"The normal man spends one-third of his life in bed," said a mattressshould provide themselves with good good food good house good entertainment, while they spend one-third of their lives on old ticks that are bumpy and hard and not in you afraid they'll nail a sanitary condition. Any moving wagon man will tell you that I speak the truth about this. "Especially in the suburbs and the country districts is this true. It is especially true of persons who do hard physical work—the very ones who should have good beds. Go through the tenements of the city and examine beds. You will not be surprised that the people who sleep on them are wan and restless, filled with nervous diseases and wild ideas of political economy. "Disraeli advised all young men to start out in life with good clothes. That is good advice, but he should have advised them also to buy a good bed. He slept on one. A man who does not sleep well is fearfully handicapped in the race for a livelihood. Uncomfortable beds cause nine-tenths of the nervous diseases with which humanity is afflicted. I have known instances where persons who had spent hundreds of dollars with doctors in vain were restored to health by merely buying good beds. "The construction of a sanitary bed is a work of art, yet is so simple that any housewife could be taught to make If I had my way I would close up a few of the charity hospitals and use the money thus saved in supplying beds to the poor and in maintaining a college of beds, where the art of making beds should be taught. You will find that every man or woman who amounts to anything these days sleeps on a good bed; you will find as a corollary to this proposition that every anarchist and every sufferer from ne vous diseases does not sleep on a good bed. If you have not a first-class mat-tres, buy one at once, even if you have to sell the piano to raise the money.

"Jails and all public institutions should have better beds, and the law should set a standard for hotel beds. They are as necessary as pure food." -New York Mail and Express.

Is Leprosy Curable?

That lepers may be cured if they will only keep from eating fish was recently asserted in a lecture at the Polyalinia (London) by Jonathan Polyclinie (London) Hutchinson. The speaker, as reported by the London correspondent of the Medical News (July 7), "showed a case of recovery from leprosy, remarking that he would use the term 'cure' but for his awe of certain captious critics, for the patient had permanent anesthesia of the hands, and, to a less extent, of his feet. All evidence of active leprosy, however, had been absent for six years. The words 'cure' and 'recovery' meant cessation of disease processes, not absolute retoration to normal condition. He mentioned another case of a florid, healthy-looking man, quite blind from leprosy, whose hands were to some extent helpless from anesthesia and muscular atrophy. But for fifteen years he was free from aggressive symptoms. * * * The treatment consisted in small doses of arsenic, liberal diet, and abstinence from fish. In about eighteen months all traces of patches had disappeared from his hands and feet. From that time unusual slow restoration progressed, the hands became less dusky and somewhat less numb, and the ulnar nerves smaller. The patient enjoyed good health, except that he suffered from dyspepsia.

"As long ago as 1879 Mr. Hutchinson published a case of recovery from lep-rosy. A woman returned from Barbadoes with leprosy in the most severe form—the tubercular. In the course of years, whilst residing in England, recovered, but her hands remained numb and crippled. She was en-joined to abstain from fish. Mr. Hutchinson since then has seen many cases

BOLIVIAN NATIVES. [National Geographic Magazine.]

The Indian women are ingenious and industrious, and have remarkable taste in colors and designs. They love gay tints and embroideries, and wear quantitles of adornments. They have a distinctive costume of home manufacture, which the dealers in imported goods fortunately have not been able to disturb. They usually wear a little Panama hat, braided of soft white with a black band, perched jauntily upon their abundant black hair, which hangs in two long braids down their backs. Their dresses resemble those worn by the peasants in the Tyrol. The short skirts of gay colors hang above the shoe tops, and reveal gay hosiery and native shoes of bright-colored leather, with long laces and high French heels. Sometimes the shoes are white, sometimes yellow, red or purple-the brighter the betterand any color except black. Under the skirt are an indefinite number of white petticoats, elaborately embroidered, and edged with lace. The waists are made of bright-colored calico, veteen and other fabrics, and around their shoulders they wear light shawls or scarfs, called rebozos. The men go barefooted and barelegged, and wear short wide trousers of dark woolen cloth that are slit up the back as far as the knee, so as to give their legs free action in climbing the mountain trails. Under these trouthey have white drawers, which always seem to be clean and well laundered. Upon their heads they wear close-fitting caps or hoods of knitted work or some dark woolen cloth that fits closely down over the ears and the neck, like the hoods dren wear in cold weather in New England. Upon this they wear hats of straw or felt, while their bodies are protected by the inevitable poncho. which is their coat by day and their blanket by night, a comprehensive as well as comfortable garment.
