Juliana laughed. 'I should like to do 50," she said, after a slight pause. "Yes, I should decidedly like to have a peep into my future."

"Your future! Is it not already known to you? You are to become Mrs. Deacon Prynne, and so on, eh?"

The girl bit her lips in silence, and walked on by the side of her companion. Their road lay between two high hills. On one side of them flowed a broad.

On one side of them flowed a broad, winding stream, on the other, fertile meadows, with here and there a cluster of fine trees.

After a walk of a couple of miles,
Juliana and Vaughan came upon a group of humble dwellings, in one of which lived old Mother Morgan and her widowed daughter.
"I think I'd better go in first and speak to Bessy," Juliana observed to her companion.

"Very well; but I should like to see Bessy, for I remember her before I went abroad, and should like, if possible, to be of service to her."

Juliana nodded her head, and then hastened onward in the direction of Mother Morgan's cottage, at the open door of which she found the old woman sitting with an infant on her lap.
"Good morning, Mrs. Morgan," Juliana commenced.

"Good morning, miss," returned the other, glancing at the young girl under a pair of thick, inky eyebrows.
"Is that Bessy's baby?" inquired Juliana, kneeling down and removing the light covering which concealed its little red face. What's its name? Oh, how pretty it is! How is it called?" cried the girl, rapidly. It ha'n't been christened," returned

"It ha'n't been christened," returned the grandame.
"Not been christened?"
"No, miss; it was to have been christened this merning, but its intended godparents, John Jones and Mary Williams, have disappointed us, and the child had its best clothes put on for nothing."
"That's a pity, and the village church ose by," Juliana remarked. Then she se and beckoned to Vaughan, who was tanding a short distance off, and he at once obeyed the signal and hurried toward her.

rd her.
Vaughan," said she, speaking in a low loe, "I've an idea. This is Bessy nks' babe—isn't it a love?"
But your idea, Juliana?"
Oh, it's quite a sudden one. You must ow that it's dressed to be christened, d the persons who were to have stood as god-parents to it can't come. Now, this is it: Shall be become its sponsors? I should like it above all things.

"And so should I," Vaughan replied, quickly, "on condition that the child be called Juliana." "What say you to accepting this gentleman and myself for your Infant's godparents?" asked the girl, addressing the old woman. "Bessy will make no objection to it, I am sure."

Mother Morgan stared at the handsome couple standing before her scarcely be-couple standing before her, scarcely be-lieving the evidence of her ears. "What!" exclaimed she, quite overjoyed at the pro-posal. "You would be the child's god-father and godmother? Bessy make no objection to it, I should think, indeed! Why, she'll be fit to jump out of her skin with joy and gratitude! Here, Bessy! Bessy! make haste and come here!" continued the dame, shouting out at the top of her voice. "Come, Bessy, I say! Here's Miss Monkshawe and a gentleman, Mr. Vaughan, I think, who are ready and willing to do you and the child a great honor!"

At this a delicate-looking woman of thout 30 years of age, made her ap-cearance and courtsied to the couple from Mother Morgan then explained to her daughter the substance of the conversa-tion she had just had with Miss Monkshawe, after which Bessy expressed her thankfulness to the lady, who had al-ready possessed herself of the infant, whose lips she was pressing with her Then they all crossed the road in the valley and reached the little church, where the ceremony was at once per-

When all was over Juliana resigned her charge into the arms of its mother, into whose hand she secretly pressed a couple of sovereigns After this Juliana and Vaughan turned round in order to pursue their way back home. But they had not proceeded many paces when the old woman overtook them. "Miss Monkshawe." spoke the dame, with an air of mystery, "will you let me look at, your hand?".

The girl hesitated, and Vaughan made n ugly grimace, "Shall I, Vaughan?" she asked, unnttoning her glove.

"Nay, please yourself," he laughed.
Her glove being now off, Juliana placed ier hand in that of the erone, who re-tarded it attentively for some few mo-ments before she spoke farther. ments before she spoke farther.

"May the days of your life pass lightly and brightly over you, miss!" she said, at length. "But I doubt that they will do so," she continued, examing the girl's palm and shaking her grizzled head, "You love one another," she went on, glancing first at Vaughan and then at Juliana, whose cheeks became all aflame.

Neither Vaughan nor Juliane could six whose cheeks became all aflame.

Neither Vaughan nor Juliana could give utterance to a syllable, for each felt that the woman had read the hidden secret of their hearts.

"Ah!" cried the old woman, with a shudder, and dropping the young girl's hand; "I'll read no more, for you would not thank me for what I might tell you, miss; and—"

"What you might tell me, Mrs. Mor-gan!" repeated Juliana, rapidly chang-ing color. "What does my hand inform you of? Speak! let me hear."
"Don't ask me, for I dare not speak! Heaven bless your beautiful face, and yours too, Mr. Vaughan; and may the angels keep you, miss, from the harm that too plainly I see is threatening you. And with those words Mother Morgan turned away and speedily disappeared.

CHAPTER V.

When the old woman was quite out of sight Vaughan turned and laughed awkwardly.
What a mistake she made in taking the Juliana?" he us for a pair of lovers-eh, Juliana?" marked.
"A mistake? Yes, indeed!" answered

"A mistake? Yes, indeed!" answered the girl, absently, a warm flush mantling her cheeks and her brow up to the very roots of her hair.

Then they walked on together quite silently, and so much occupied with their own thoughts that they did not notice the dark clouds which had gathered above their heads and obscured all the sun's rave suddenly there was a rumbling in the distance.

Juliana looked up in terror.

"That was thunder, surely, Vaughan?"

"That was thunder, surely, Vaughan?" said she.

"Yes, I think so," was the young man's answer. "Let us hasten our steps," he added, glancing around at the horizon.
"A thunderstorm is fast approaching.
"Into the wood—into the wood! where I shall not be able to see the awful lightning flash, Vaughan!" the girl cried out in alarm, and at the same time dashing onward. Onward.

Vaughan fellowed his companion's steps and after a short space they reached the wood, the trees of which would, at any rate, afferd them temporary shelter.

As yet not a drop of rain had fallen, but the thunder was crashing, peal after peal, in rapid succession.

Juliana's face was void of all color, and she was trembling from head to foot.

They sought the protection of a mighty oak, at the foot of which the girl sank, quite overcome with alarm. But she had not been seated many seconds before she sprang up again.

"Oh, Vaughan, my bracelet is gone—my bracelet containing Deacon's portrait!" she cried in great distress. "Whatever shall I do?" And without waiting to hear what her companion would reply, she hastened back in the direction she had just come.

Vaughan followed her, and hardly had he gained her side, when he exclaimed, joyfully, "I have found it—I have found.

It! Oh, how fortunate I am!" And stooping down he picked up the missing trinket and handed it to her.

"Oh, thank you, Vaughan!" she said, very gratefully. And then their eyes were blinded by a sudden lurid flash, and a peal resounded which seemed to shake the very earth beneath their feet. They looked behind them, and lo! the tree under which they had been resting only a moment ago was torn up by the roots and felled to the ground.

And yet this pair could scarcely realize what had happened.

A momentary bewilderment had seized upon them both. And Vaughan was only sensible that he was holding Juliana in his arms, and that her head was supported by his shoulder.

Caused by overwork? No, caused by undernourishment. Work rarely causes collapse. It is worry—the outcome of a low condition of the nervous system and inadequate nutrition which generally causes collapse. The collapse seems sudden, but in reality it is a slow process. The stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition are diseased, the nourishment in the food eaten is only partially extracted and imperfectly assimilated. The blood becomes impure; the very fount of life is poisoned, and some day all the faculties and functions go on a strike. That's collapse. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the organs of digestion and nutrition, purifies the blood and builds up the weak body with sound healthy flesh. "I was cured of a very bad case of indigestion, associated with torpid liver, by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery," writes Mr. G. B. Bird, of Byrnside, Putnam Co., W. Va. "Refore I began the use of 'Golden Medical Discovery' I had no appetite; could not sleep, nor work but very little, bowels constipated, and life was a misery to me. After taking four bottles I felt so well that I went to work, but soon got worse, so I used it about eight weeks longer, when I was permanently cured."

AT WINDSOR.

Windsor, Aug. 21.—A heavy rain commenced shortly after 1 o'clock yesterday, and continued until post time, leaving the track a sea of mud. In the first race Elba was favorite in the beginning, but got off badly, and made a desperate effort to win from Northumbria, at 15 to 1, but the latter had four lengths to the good turning into the stretch, and won by a neck from Elba; Jim Nap, third. Henry Zitt and All Gray, coupled as the Harlin entry, and 1 to 2 in the books, ran first and third. Zitt led all the way, winning by four lengths from Newton W. Jim McGibben was picked by the talent to win the steeplechase, but second position was the best he could get. Coley and George W. Jenkins raced like a team to the sixth hurdle; where Coley dropped back, McGibben taking up his place, but could do no better. Jenkins won by three lengths. Toulaca, 10 to 1, won the fourth as she pleased. Raveling, an even money favorite, finished among the also rans. The Geiser ran second and Himtime as she pleased.
