

ber following, and his capture of the whole British fleet on Lake Erie, decided the fate of the enemy on the whole northwestern frontier. The entire British army on the straits of Detroit, and all their military posts and dependencies there and on all the upper lakes, fell an easy prey to the victorious march of General Harrison and his army before the close of that autumn.