harmless implements, compared to other means of destruction, with which providence in this quarrel has fought on the side of the invaded.

But such losses are, it seems, of no avail to us, and cause no prejudice to France: for, important as the lives of our fellowsubjects are to Britain, our author sets those of Frenchmen at a low rate indeed; as near nothing as words can flate them; p. 76. " In the present course of the war France can lose nothing by a defeat. Except only " in the number of the killed and wounded, which in the common course of battles " may be fet at about the double of that of the conquerors, what other loss have our enemies to sustain?" Magazines, artillery and baggage are small items that have been here omitted in this account. Yet by such loffes those very enemies have, in different periods of their history, been driven out of Germany; and the same fate, p. 24. attending almost invariably, in numberless instances, their unjust attempts upon other countries, prove to conviction, if perfidious ambition could be convinced, that France, stronger at land (within her own dominions) than England or any other power in Europe, p. 3. loses that superiority when she ventures far from home, beyond the influence of her infinite resources, p. 67. And
