Potash for Grapes and Potatoes.

A French joirnal—the Revue Horticolor—records the results of experiments conducted by M. Ville at Vincennes, which will interest all grape growers, and which show conclusively that the use on vines of wood ashes—which contain much potash—is justified by both theory and practice. A number of vines were planted under like conditions, each in a separate plot, divided from its fellows by a pathway rather more than three feet in width (one metre). The whole area covered was a hundred square metres, each square metre being planted with one variety of vine only, each plant were starved and growing desperate—with one variety of vine only, each plant were starved and growing desperate—with one variety of vine only, each plant were starved and growing desperate—with one variety of vine only, each plant were starved and growing desperate—with one variety of vine only, each plant were starved and growing desperate—with one variety of vine only, each plant was appeared to the proper says. others was successively eliminated one of the constituent elements of the manure in question. Thus, while the one plot received the complete manure, introgen was taken from the second, phosphates from the third, potash from the fourth, lime from the fifth, and one of the plots was left without manure of any kind. This treatment was continued from 1860 to 1875 with results as follows: The vines which received the complete manure were remarkably thrifty, full of vigorous foliage and burdened with luscious bunches; those which received the complete manure with the exception of potash, made a very moderate growth, had few and poor leaves, and no fruit whatever, while those not manured at all were stunted, almost wholly leafless—little more than mere stalks.

The result is sufficiently striking, but the experiments also showed that where the potash was applied and the other cliements successively eliminated, the growth of the vine and the yield of the crop presented no sensible difference—a circumstance showing that potash is indispensable to the vine. Other substances may be omitted, and yet the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine and the yield of the growth of the vine of the vine. The farmer is proverbially economical

The farmer is proverbially economical in most matters, yet in reference to saving manures he is generally the most profligate of all mankind. More farmers, the doctor said, have been impoverished by neglecting to keep up the manure supply for their deteriorating soils than from most any other causes.
