The ladies were "out driving with Mr. Winton," said the highly respectable ex-butler, who opened the door.
"When do you expect them in?" asked Marsden.
"Can't say, sir. Not till late, anyway."

Marsden then left his card, and, urning, walked a few paces with Shirley.

"So Lady Dorrington is in town," said the latter, after their first exchange of greetings.

change of greetings.

"Indeed! I have not heard from her."

"I don't think I was mistaken. I saw her drive up to Mrs. Ruthven's hotel as I left this morning."

"I don't think is morning."

"I do not think she would be up just yet. How is Mrs. Ruthven today?!

"No great things," said Shirley.

"This unfortunate business has taken such a hold on her. I believe she suspects every sout that comes near her. She ought to get away among new scenes and people. It is a pity she has bought this villa."

"It is not a bad investment. She might sell it any day for a thousand or more than she gave. The owner was very hard up for ready money."

"Ah! that's always the way—those that have, to them shall be given. And our charming friend has a keen appreciation of a bargair!"

"Of course—it is in her blood," said Marsden laughing. "Now I must go look after this sister of mine. Shall you see Mrs. Ruthven today?"

"Hope to do so. Sne fancies she has some faint clew to the rufflan that robbed her. I don't believe it myself. It seems there is some suspicion about a half caste, from Pondichery. I scarcely know what," and Shirley pulled himself up. "I avoid the subject with her now."

ly know what," and Shirley pulled himself up. "I avoid the subject with her now."

"We cannot wonder if she is a little morbid! I shall call at any rate—early to-morrow." They exchanged "good-mornings," and parted.

"I wonder the hereaved widow did not send for me?" mused Marsden.

"Why does she hang on to that caq?" he walked slowly towards his club. "I don't fancy she cares for him, not now at least—I wish she did—or, for any one except mysel!! She might have him for a trustee—she may have whom she likes. I am well out of my difficulties, and I'll take deuced good care to keep clear of any more. The fact is I am very simple in my tastes, only I fell in with an extravagant set. I wish Mrs. Ruthven would take her departure—anywhere, even to another world. Has she made a will? Who has she fifte her money to? She has no relations. Suppose she made me her residuary legate? That would be too comic. I wonder my she is so civil to Nora. She is always watching her. She is such a keen devil, she suspects I am in love with my charming cousin. Ay! but she little knows how deeply! That girl has given me fresh youth and force and invention. Nothing shall part us. But I must be cautious for a little longer—then—" cautious for a little longer—then—"

So, with head erect, a delicious sense of success uplifting his spirit, Marsden strolled down Park Lune and along Piccadilly, Reaching his club, he found a note from his sister, commanding, —rather than inviting—him to dinner that day. Marsden felt bound to obey—much to his annoyance.
Lady Dorrington was extremely formidable to him just then. She knew sbmething of nis life and embarrassments—and she suspected more. She had no hesitation in questioning him, in the coolest and most embarrassing manner, moreover, it was exceedingly difficult to mislead her.

Marsden, however, prepared himself for the ordeal, and "came up smiling" at seven-thirty, with his pleasantest frankest manner. "Well, Clifford, and what have you been doing with yourself since we parted?" asked Lady Dorrington, when dinner was over and they were left dinner was over and they were left alone.

"A great many things... It has been a beastly time altogether. I was over in Amsterdam, as you know, after those unlucky jewels. I was in great hopes of finding a clew there, but it's nouse, Mrs. Ruthven will never see them again. Then I went to Paris. to see De Meudon. He was awfully ill, poor fellow—gastric fever or some such thing. I spent a few days with him at his villa, and had a talk with some of the principal jewelers in Paris, but could find nothing. One of them suggested the stones might have gone to New York or Sydney. Then I came over here to attend Mrs. Ruthven's business—she was in such a violent hurry about that villa."

"Is the affair finished, and the money paid down?" sharply.

"Yes," returned Marsden, looking up surprised. "Why do you ask?"

"Thank God!" said Lady Dorrington emphatically. "You know I never mince matters, and I can tell you I was in a horrird fright about this purchase, lest the money for it should not be forthcoming in time."

"My. dear sister, I am immensely flattered by your high opinion of your only brother," howing ironically.

"That is all very well, Clifford, but I know you, and I know what temptation a large sum of money absolutely at your disposal must be. I dreaded the appointment of a new trustee and the discoveries he might make; that was one reason why I was so eazer to press your marriage with Mrs. Ruthven. I am still anxious for it, but not for its immediate celebration."

"Isabelie," said Marsden, quietly, but in a tone of feeling, while he looked straight at her, his soft, dark-blue eyes grave and reproachful, "I have been reckless, extravagant, everything I ought not to be but to rob a woman, too, of whom I am, in a sense, the guardian—that is an infamy of which I am incapable." He was evidently a good deal moved. "I do not deserve such suspicions from you."

"Well, I am sure I hope not," cried Lady Dorrington, with a searching look; "I beg your pardon; but I confess I have been terrible uneasy since you paid off that mortgage of Greenwood's, in May."

"Olifford," cried Lady Dorrington,
"I know that you have very little you are the last of our family. I want to see you well married and free from

I am very sorry."

"I can afford to forgive you, I sabelle, but if you knew how much I value your good opinion you would not have wounded me as you have done." Lady Dorrington quite melted, held out her hand, and Marsden rose, took it, and kissed her brow. "Now," she resumed cheerfully, after a moment's silence, "let us talk seriously of your marriage." "Must I marry?" "Why, yes, of course. It is a special intervention of Providence that sent Mrs. Ruthven in your way—and such an attractive woman too." "Yes, she does her best in that line." "And to judge by your conduct, especially the night of that unlucky ball, she is eminently successful. You really must not play fast and loose with a woman's affections." "Affections! You don't mean to sav you believe Mrs. Ruthven has any affections. She has vanity if you like, and gratifics it unscrupulously; they used to tell funny stories of her up in the Hills." "Still, Clifford, I do think she is sincrely attached to you; and just consider what her money would do for you and your estate!" "I don't think you show much true friendship for her by trying to marry her to an impecunious country gentleman." "Nonsense! You only want a little reader agency to put you straight.

"Nonsense! You only want a little ready money to put you straight again, and the estates would soon recover."
"Give her another chance," pursued

Marsden. "Ask one or two matrimonially disposed peers to meet her, and see if my fascinations would counterbalance

"I shall do nothing of the kind," cried Lady Dorrington, impatiently. "I dare say you are talking in this strain just to worry me. I dare say you have made up your mind to marry her all the time. If so, do not be too sure of your/ game—beware of that Captain Shirley. He is a rival, a masked rival; he is always hanging about, and acting as if he were her best friend.

"He is decidedly objectionable; but l do not fear him."
"You are wrong, Clifford! He is not to be despised! I am going to persuade Mrs. Ruthven to come down with me to Chedworth. It will draw her away from her perpetual fretting about those jewels; they are a perfect craze; and I think those horrid detectives are playing upon our credulity; it is a game that pays them well."
