good agricultural soil, about that period in its history when the settlers have ceased buying their bread and meat, and are beginning to mars timber, staves, cordwood, logs and wed lumber. Blacksmiths' shops and wagon shops, and roadside taverns, are springing up all over. Many saw mills will be noted, emoloying in the aggregate a considerable number of men. The settler who is "forehanded," and can do so, hires help liberally in order the more quickly to turn the "clearing" into a productive grain field. Besides the owners of the soil there are to be found choppers, teamsters, loggers, lumbermen, etc., many of them with families. Children of all sizes swarm about every house.

Visit the same locality thirty years later, and, behold—what a change! Half the roadside taverns, or three-fourths of them, have vanished away from sheer lack of] custom, and that altogether independently of the Scott Act. The old blacksmith shops and wagon shops have disappeared, their custom has gone to the villages, or to the towns. At one place a big chimney, almost at the tumble-down, gives you assurance that once a sawmill stood there. I remember, my friend, when that same sawmill employed some twenty-five or thurty hands, half of them men with families. Let me relate something about a certain old original settler, whose name for the present may be—Smith. He had two hundred acres, all paid tor, also three sons and three daughters. Though pretty well off for buildings already he was almost every year making work for men by building something more—a new driving house, it might be, or an extension to the dwelling. One of the sons has the farm now, the other two are in business.

It never rains but it pours. For years and years her friends have looked in vain for a book giving the historical wat statistics of our Provincial University; this year has seen two little books published to meet the want. "Tasti," which came out some weeks ago, was purely statistical; the Year Book just to hand in purely historical; and therefore what would have been better done had it been done conjointly is still done in a satisfactory manner in the two volumes. Perhaps next time a combination will be effected. The Year Book overs 150 pages, and contains historical satisfactory manner in the two volumes. Perhaps next time a combination will be effected. **Rewspapers are every now and then amoyed by being lead into publishing bogus birth and marriage notices. No such announcement ought to be taken unless endorsed by the same. It is a mean trick at best, and the public will be glad to learn that an example is to be made of two citizens, otherwise respectable, who thought they did a clever thing at the expense of a friend by inserting a bogus birth notice in a city paper not long ago.

In this way alone, we contend, is there a prospect of arriving at a fair settlement.

The question of the advisability of reciprocal free trade in natural products of the two countries is a different matter altogether. Since the last treaty was negotiated the circumstances of both countries have yearly changed. The United States have acquired a world-wide trade, and their profits will be increased in proportion to the decrease in Government, you represent me as protesting against the teachings on alcohol in the Manual of Hygiene, authorized by the Department of Education for use in the schools, on the ground that it treated of the effects of the abuse and not of the use of alcohol. The wording of your report is apt to cause misapprehension. My objection was that it unfairly represented the effects of the abuse of alcoholic beverages to be the effects of their proper and moderate use, and that the overwhelming preponderance of medical evidence is against the absurd doctrines commonly represented by teetotalers to be the teachings of medical science.
