The forces of the government, under command of General Hercule Plutarque, have driven back the rebels who were marching against Miravalles, a town about 30 miles northeast of Port Au Prince. The safety of the capital is now assured because of the loyal forces occupying the important communes of Miravalles and Las Cabanas.

The revolutionists have arranged their forces in three divisions. The first, commanded by General Chapuzette, was proceeding against Port Au Prince by way of Miravalles when checked by General Plutarque. The second division, under command of General Augustin, is advancing against Gonaves by way of Hinche, the small town now occupied by the insurgents. The third, under General Delphin, has as its objective point Cape Haitien, by way of Valliere, which the rebels also hold.

The government is despatching reinforcements, arms and munitions to Fort Luberte. It is understood that President Simon, who is at that place, is preparing to make a general attack against the revolutionists. All military chiefs are remaining faithful to the government. Now that the great triple event is over and the long tension of expectation relaxed, one is able to view the events in truer perspective. The Coronation of King and Emperor, the Royal procession and the naval review at Spithead were all essential parts of the one complete transaction, which easily transcended in splendor, in suggestions and evidences of power and in world significance any peaceful demonstration recorded in history.
